No, the job of scientific research in agriculture is not over, nor will it ever be. But today we have a new job, a new field for experimenting—that of social control. Research to increase productive efficiency, to widen markets, must continue. Eliminate the less important research activities, in deference to the need for economy; get rid of the deadwood in our scientific organizations, but keep the men of science at the tasks which will always need doing. And add to the old job, the one that has been begun so well, this new job of developing the machinery of social control.

Can we, do you suppose, become as efficient in our social experimenting as we have already proved ourselves in scientific experimenting? If this can be done, we can go ahead into one triumph after another in the scientific world. If it is not done, I fear for the future of our civilization.

The farm bill is an effort in the direction of such social inventiveness. In some ways it is perhaps as crude as the first automobile. But I believe it is profoundly right in purpose, for it attempts a reconciliation between science and social justice; and I believe it can be made to work if the rank and file of the people of the United States—the men who grow our food, the men who handle and distribute it, the men and women who consume it—the new machine will work if all these people are genuinely hungry to distribute the fruits of science in a just way.

For that is our great modern problem. Having conquered the fear of famine, with the aid of science, having been brought into an age of abundance, we now have to learn how to live with abundance. Sometimes I think it requires stronger characters, greater hearts, and keener minds to endure abundance than it takes to endure penury. Certainly it requires a new degree of tolerance among competing economic groups and a willingness to subordinate the will of the few to the welfare of the many.

Personally, I think the last 12 years have imprinted this lesson deeply on all of us. I think we are ready now to reach out toward a new order. I believe we are ready to attempt to plan our economic life in return for stability and security. If this is true, then we have reached a great moment in the history of mankind. We have determined to become the masters rather than the victims of destiny. We are daring to bring the economic interests of men under conscious human control.

We may make mistakes along the way; we may have difficulty in mastering all the intricacies of an economic system that is full of puzzling contradictions; but if we operate our new social machinery with the spirit of social justice in all our hearts, I believe that it will work.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its clerks, announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 4606) to provide for cooperation by the Federal Government with the several States and Territories and the District of Columbia in relieving the hardship and suffering caused by unemployment, and for other purposes; asked a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon; and that Mr. STEAGALL, Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH, and Mr. LUCE were appointed managers on the part of the House at the conference.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate numbered 85 to the bill (H.R. 3835) to relieve the existing national economic emergency by increasing agricultural purchasing power, to raise revenue for extraordinary purposes incurred by reason of such emergency, to provide emergency relief with respect to agricultural indebtedness, to provide for the orderly liquidation of joint-stock land banks, and for other purposes; that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1 to 84, inclusive, to the bill; that the House had agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. JONES, Mr. FULMER, Mr. DOXEY, Mr. CLARKE of New York, and Mr. HOPE were appointed managers on the part of the House at the conference.

MUSCLE SHOALS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1272) to improve the navigability and to provide for the flood control of the Tennessee River, to provide for reforestation and the proper use of marginal lands in the Tennessee Valley; to provide for the agricultural and industrial development of said valley; to provide for the national defense by the creation of a corporation for the operation of Government properties at and near Muscle Shoals in the State of Alabama; and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I wish to call up an amendment that I presented some days ago relating to the fertilizer provisions of the bill. The amendment has been printed and is on the desks of Senators. Before proceeding I want to make two changes in it. I send one of them to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Alabama modifies his amendment.

Mr. BANKHEAD. On page 3 of my amendment, just preceding subsection (k), I want to add the following words:

Instead of exercising the powers granted by subsections (d) and (j), the Board is authorized.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will state the amendment, as modified.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. The Senator from Alabama proposes the following amendment:

On page 6, strike out section (d) and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"(d) The Board shall manufacture fixed nitrogen and/or other fertilizer ingredients at Muscle Shoals by the employment of existing facilities (by modernizing existing plants), or by any other process or processes that in its judgment shall appear wise and profitable for the fixation of atmospheric nitrogen, and/or other fertilizer ingredients for agricultural and military uses."

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, in explanation of this amendment, permit me to say that section (d) in the Norris bill, the pending bill, authorizes the board to manufacture nitrogen, which is one of the ingredients of fertilizer. I have offered in lieu of that section a section from the Hill bill, passed by the House of Representatives, to authorize the manufacture of nitrogen or fertilizer ingredients.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DUFFY in the chair). Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I am trying to locate the place in the bill where the Senator's amendment applies. The Senator's amendment is not printed, is it?

Mr. BANKHEAD. The original amendment is printed. The one I have just sent up is in addition to the one I have heretofore presented.

Mr. NORRIS. I have on my desk two printed amendments of considerable length which the Senator proposes to offer and has had printed. Is it one of those that the Senator has offered?

Mr. BANKHEAD. It is the fertilizer amendment. It begins with:

It shall be the duty of the Board to operate the nitrate plants—

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The amendment which the Senator has just sent to the desk and had read is the amendment which he has incorporated in his fertilizer amendment?

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is correct; it adds to it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. And where is it proposed to be inserted?

Mr. BANKHEAD. The amendment proposes to strike out subsection (d) of the pending bill and in lieu thereof to insert the words incorporated in my amendment, which I have taken from the bill which was passed by the House of Representatives.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield further, the pending amendment which he has offered is not an amendment to his amendment?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I am adding it to my amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator does not need to get consent to do that.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I am explaining it; that is all.

Mr. NORRIS. It says here "on page 6." Does that mean page 6 of the Senator's amendment?

Mr. BANKHEAD. No, sir; that strikes out subsection (d) on page 6 of the bill of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not see how the Senator can incorporate that with the other amendment pending. Of course, the Senator can change his amendment as he sees fit; he does not need to offer it as an amendment to his amendment.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I have just changed my amendment so as to include that provision.

Mr. NORRIS. What I am trying to find out is what is now the pending amendment. The one which I have and which the clerk has sent to me is simply a change of subsection (d), page 6 of the Senate bill.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I have changed the printed amendment by adding that to it, so that both together constitute the pending amendment.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield.

Mr. KING. I am greatly interested in this matter, but I confess, perhaps due to my own lack of understanding, that I do not grasp the situation. As I understood the Senator from Alabama, he intended to offer a substitute for the so-called "Norris bill" which would take the place of the entire Norris bill textually.

Mr. BANKHEAD. No; that is not the situation. The amendment relates solely to the fertilizer provision.

Mr. KING. The amendment the Senator proposes to discuss attacks only subdivision (i) of section 5 of the Norris bill?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Oh, no. It adds further provisions to the amendment. It does not attack in any way the Norris bill as it relates to fertilizer except by the substitution of the House section for subsection (d) and then provides additional powers for the board.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator propose to leave in the bill as it shall finally pass, even if his amendment shall be adopted, subsection (i) of section 5 of the Norris bill?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. KING. Then the Senator is not challenging subsection (i) at all?

Mr. BANKHEAD. No.

Mr. President, in order that it may be understood what is involved, permit me to make a brief explanation of the addition which the amendment tendered by me makes to the Norris bill. Of course, it is well understood, as the author of the Norris bill stated on the floor of the Senate, that he does not believe the production of fertilizer at the nitrate plant at Muscle Shoals is an economical proposition. For that reason his bill makes very few provisions on the subject except for experimentation. With that phase of it I am in the very fullest accord. The bill contains the following provision:

(d) The Board shall manufacture fixed nitrogen at Muscle Shoals by the employment of existing facilities, by modernizing existing plants, or by any process or processes that in its judgment shall appear wise and profitable for the fixation of atmospheric nitrogen.

My amendment proposes to add to that an authorization to the board for the manufacture of all elements and ingredients of fertilizer in addition to nitrogen, which is alone provided for in the pending bill.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield.

Mr. SMITH. That language would be inserted right after the word "nitrogen" in the Norris bill? The Senator wishes to add "and other fertilizer ingredients for agricultural and military uses"?

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is the effect of it.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I do not understand that to be the case at all. I do not want any misapprehension. If that is all there is to it, it would be a different matter; but if the Senator will examine the amendment, he will find that it goes much further than he has just stated.

Mr. SMITH. I mean the amendment just now offered by the Senator from Alabama. I presume the Senator from Alabama will offer an amendment to subsection (e) as well?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. May I point out to the Senator that confusion has arisen as to the last amendment which he has proposed? He indicated that he intended to modify the original fertilizer amendment offered by himself.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes; by adding this language to it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The language that he has offered is an amendment to the text of the bill rather than a modification of his own amendment.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I want to put it in shape, if the Senator from Arkansas will help me, so as to add it to my amendment substituting the House section for subsection (d) of the pending bill.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. When the Senator first offered the language, which he said was a modification of his own amendment, I asked him then the question in what part of the fertilizer amendment it should be incorporated. As everybody concedes, he has a perfect right to modify his amendment, but the language of his amendment last offered is "amendment intended to be proposed" to the Senator's own amendment. However, upon reading the language, it clearly indicates that it is an amendment to the text of the bill. If the Senator would change it to indicate what part of his own amendment is to be modified, it would clarify and simplify the matter.

Mr. SMITH. May I not suggest to the Senator from Alabama that he just add his amendment to subsection (d) by inserting the desired language at the end of subsection (d). Then it fits in exactly with his proposed modification of subsection (e).

Mr. BANKHEAD. I will do that a little later, although I think it is clear what my purpose is, which is to substitute the language of the House bill in that regard for subsection (d) of the Norris bill. Whatever may be the proper parliamentary way of presenting it, I shall be very glad to pursue that course as soon as I have an opportunity to adjust the language accordingly.

Mr. President, on the subject of fertilizer the pending bill requires the board to operate the nitrate plants or either of them by employment of existing facilities or the modernizing of existing plants and facilities for the production of nitrogenous plant food of the kind and quality indicated, and so forth. Then it is provided, in addition, that instead of exercising the powers granted to the board to produce fertilizer either voluntarily as provided in the original amendment or under the compulsory provision contained in the House bill, the board may lease the nitrate plant upon terms and conditions set out in the proposed amendment. That amendment requires the production of a certain quantity of nitrate, 10,000 tons. In addition to that it authorizes the manufacture of phosphoric acid. As we all know, these are the two elements of fertilizer which are manufactured—nitrogen and phosphoric acid. Potash is the third element. We get our supply of potash from Germany, though we have some small deposits in New Mexico.

The original bill limits the use of the plant at Muscle Shoals to the production of one of the elements of fertilizer. My amendment proposes to extend that authority to include the production of the other element, phosphoric acid, so that in the production of complete fertilizer ready for application to the soil there is no limitation either upon the board, if it sees fit to conduct the operations itself, or upon a lessee, if a lease is secured, which would prevent the manufacture in the existing plant or in the additional facilities of the two essential elements of fertilizer.

Mr. President, as a basis for present consideration of the question, let us look to that great plant built there at a cost of many millions of dollars. Are we going to utilize that plant to its full capacity and get all the beneficial results from it that were intended, or is it simply to be used as a place for experimentation? I do not mean by that statement to minimize in any way the advantages of experimentation, but in addition to experimentation I hope to see the plant put into operation and use for the benefit of agriculture as was intended when the original law was enacted authorizing its construction.

I see sitting in front of me the distinguished senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], who is always diligent and effective when the interests of agriculture are concerned. He was a Member of the Senate when the program was originated during the crisis of our war times, when there was apprehension by the Government that possibly the supply of Chilean nitrate absolutely essential for the manufacture of explosives might be cut off. The Congress and the administration decided to build here in our country, remote from the seacoast and danger of destruction from that source, a plant for the production of fertilizers, to prevent a catastrophe to this country in the event that during the war period our supply of nitrate should be cut off. Provision was made for the construction of the plant for the manufacture of nitrate to be used in time of war.

But, Mr. President, everybody connected with that program realized that war would probably not last many years. Everybody realized that we were making a great investment there in the construction of the Wilson Dam for the creation of power and in the construction of the great nitrate plant. Naturally their thoughts turned to the question, What disposition are we going to make of that plant when peace comes? What use are we going to make of it rather than let it stand idle until, forsooth, at some future day we may again become engaged in war? The Senator from South Carolina, interested in agriculture, proposed this plan:

The President * * * is further authorized to construct—

I am reading from section 124 of the National Defense Act of June 2, 1916—

The President * * * is further authorized to construct, maintain, and operate, at or on any site or sites so designated, dams, locks, improvements to navigation, power houses, and other plants and equipment or other means than water power, as in his judgment is the best and cheapest, necessary or convenient for the generation of electrical or other power and for the production of nitrates or other products needed for munitions of war and useful—and useful in the manufacture of fertilizers and other useful products.

So I submit that it was contemplated by the authors of this legislation, by those responsible for our great investment there, that when the war ended, when the period expired during which explosives were needed for war purposes, the investment should be used for the benefit of agriculture in America.

I regret the necessity of differing from my friend from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] upon this subject. We have a different viewpoint and judgment about whether or not this plant can be economically used for the production of fertilizer. While I am referring to the Senator from Nebraska, I desire to take this opportunity to tender my modest tribute to his great vision, to his resourcefulness and perseverance, to his overcoming over a long period of years all the obstacles that have been thrown in the way, of bringing this legislation almost to completion. I appreciate his services. I value them, and I know he is interested in agriculture. I have served with him for the last 2 years upon the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and I have never seen a time when the Senator's heart and mind were not with the struggling farmers of the country. I am glad to say that. I know that it is true from contact and association with him, and I shall be rejoiced when this entire program is put into effect. Of course we all know that it is due to the energy and perseverance of the senior Senator from Nebraska; and I really hope that when the Senator gets tired of his public duties, he will come down and live in that great Tennessee Valley, and watch the unfolding of his splendid ideals for the welfare and for the benefit of the plain people of this country. He could go to no section of America where he would be more welcome; and I say it with entire sincerity.

Upon this subject, however, we have a different understanding. Our objectives are the same; but I hope now to indicate to the Senate the reasons why fertilizer can be produced at Muscle Shoals.

I know that if the Senator from Nebraska were so convinced, he would be delighted. He said so here a few days ago. We must, however, settle this difference of understanding and of viewpoint and judgment upon that question. No question of principle is involved. There is no difference in principle. We would all like to help the farmer with this great project if we felt that it was feasible and practical.

As I have indicated many times, ever since I first made any declaration upon the subject of Muscle Shoals, my preference has been for a lease of this plant, if a lessee satisfactory to the Government could be secured. This amendment authorizes—it does not require—the board to make a lease upon terms specified in the amendment involving the production of at least 10,000 tons of nitrogen a year as a minimum, and then to be stepped up to meet the requirements of the market.

For the information of those who have not given study to the subject, permit me to say that the great difficulty in the present fertilizer situation is the small proportion of plant food contained in a ton of mixed commercial fertilizer. In 1928 the total mixed fertilizer produced in this country amounted to 4,485,350 tons. The plant food included in that amounted to only 715,841 tons, leaving only 16.42 percent of plant food in that great quantity of fertilizer, which involved a tremendous loss in the payment especially of freight charges on filler and inert matter.

It is our hope that at Muscle Shoals concentrated fertilizer may be produced, and we have reason to believe that it can be produced, so that instead of the present mixed fertilizer, containing such a small percentage of plant food, a ton of concentrated fertilizer will be equal to 4 or more tons of the present mixed fertilizer.

Experiments have been conducted down in Anniston with the electrical-furnace process, and I have here a bottle containing the results in the form of concentrated fertilizer which we hope will develop from the operation of this great plant at Muscle Shoals. If that form of fertilizer can be produced there, it will revolutionize the commercial fertilizer industry. It will bring results to the farmer that at present seem almost impossible under the present operating conditions of the fertilizer industry.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I take it from what the Senator has said today and from what he has said on other occasions, and from what he has said to me privately, that he is of the opinion that nitrate plant no. 2, located at Muscle Shoals, can be operated for the purpose of getting nitrogen out of the atmosphere and to produce fertilizer in a way that would reduce its cost to the farmer. I should like to ask the Senator if that is correct.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes; that is my viewpoint.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator believes that nitrate plant no. 2 is a proper method and as scientific as any other method of securing nitrogen from the atmosphere. Is that correct?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I cannot say, Mr. President, that I think it is the most scientific method. I am not enough of a technician to say that.

Mr. NORRIS. Well, regardless of that, I am just trying to get the Senator's view.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes; I think that nitrogen alone can be produced at Muscle Shoals at a saving to the farmer under the present price of commercial fertilizer.

Mr. NORRIS. Exactly. The Senator also believes that the best way to secure results—I think he said that in the beginning of his address today—would be to have the plant operated by a lessee, and have the Government lease it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is my judgment; that better results usually can be obtained from those interested primarily in initiative, and who are not restricted in the operation of a business in such a way as the Government possibly would be.

Mr. NORRIS. I will say to the Senator on that score—I want to elucidate it somewhat when the Senator finishes—that I have no objection to a lease of nitrate plant no. 2; and if the Senator's amendment is not agreed to, I propose to offer an amendment myself that will authorize the leasing of nitrate plant no. 2.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I am happy to hear that statement; and I do not know that there is much difference between us.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, yes; there will be considerable difference.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Of course, the Senator may put in restrictions.

Mr. NORRIS. The only restriction I want to put in is that the lessee shall make fertilizer.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I shall be glad to see the Senator's amendment, because my interest is entirely from the standpoint of getting better fertilizer results for the farmer.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand that.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I am sure the Senator does.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not want the Senator to think that any interruption or any disagreement I have with his views in any way impugns his motives.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do not consider that. I say—and the statement I made was designed simply to bring that out—that I have no pride of opinion about my amendment. In fact, it is not mine. I simply offered the amendment that received thorough consideration, I assume, at the other end of the Capitol, and it was adopted there.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do.

Mr. McKELLAR. If it should be found by experimentation that the method now set up at Muscle Shoals for making nitrogen is not the cheapest and most scientific way of producing nitrogen from the air, the Senator would not want the Government either to lease or to run that plant, would he?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I certainly would not.

Mr. McKELLAR. It seems to me that we ought to find the best method before we undertake to set up a plant there for making fertilizer.

Mr. BANKHEAD. If the Senator will permit me, I do not think we can find it by legislation. We are going to have a board there, I am sure, that we can trust. My judgment is that various options should be allowed the board, so that in the course of investigation, in the course of efforts—experiments, if you please—if, after operation for a reasonable time, it develops that there will not be a saving to the farmer, they may either abandon or shift their course of action. I am in thorough accord with the idea that we must get benefits for the farmer under this program or we should not adopt it; and, of course, I do not advocate the operation of a plant at the cost of the taxpayers.

On the subject of costs, permit me to invite attention of those who are interested in that subject to a statement contained in the Senate hearings of last year. A statement was submitted by the Muscle Shoals Commission to the Bureau of Chemistry of the Government, setting up a complete itemized statement of costs for the production of nitrogen alone at Muscle Shoals, and a request was made of the Bureau of Chemistry for their opinion on the subject. In their reply, dated September 26, 1931, they say:

The two outstanding figures of this statement are believed to be essentially correct; that is, the price of cyanamid and the cost of production at plant no. 2. This Bureau does not, however, agree with the conclusion that the operation of the plant can afford relief to our farmers. It is true that nitrogen can be fixed cheaper in the form of cyanamid. The difficulty has been that cyanamid is not a popular material with American farmers and does not fit in well with American fertilizer practice.

In other words, the Bureau of Chemistry, which is not friendly to this program, reports that nitrogen can be produced cheaper, but its objection is based upon the ground of sales resistance upon the part of the farmer.

Mr. President, all of these great developments in their inception have met with sales resistance.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I had understood that the President wanted the Norris bill. That is my understanding, as I read the papers, that President Roosevelt wants the Norris Muscle Shoals bill. Am I right about that or not? Does the Senator know?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I have had no communication from the President on the subject.

Mr. LONG. I have been looking for an opportunity to admonish my colleagues, as they have admonished me, to stand by the President.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The Senator has not very faithfully observed it, though, has he?

Mr. LONG. I want to get on the line. It is my understanding that the President wants the Norris bill. If that is so, I want to drop that note of warning that it has become popular to stand by the President. That is what I want to do, to stand by the President. If he is for the Senator's plan, I am for it. If he is not, I am for the Norris plan.

Mr. BANKHEAD. As I have seen stated on the floor of the other House, or have read, I take it that the President does not presume to be an umpire between the two provisions—the bill which passed the House and the Senate committee bill.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me again?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course, the Senator was present at the conference with the President and heard what he said. Does the Senator think it is possible to construe what the President said into an approval of this amendment, which would compel the board to go into the manufacture of fertilizer on a commercial basis? Is there any reason for thinking that the President favors that kind of a proposition?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I must say that I did not get that impression, though I do say, and I think the Senator will recognize, that there was uncertainty in what did take place.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator will remember that what the President said was that if we were going to do that at Muscle Shoals, we would be called upon to do it everywhere else in the United States.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I recognize that; but the Senator will also recognize the fact that it was the insistence of everyone else in that conference, including the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK]—I will not say that the Senator from Tennessee engaged in it—but the Chairman of the Military Affairs Committee of the House, and the ranking member of the Military Affairs Committee of the House, that fertilizer could be and should be produced at Muscle Shoals, and the Chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs of the House had with him a prepared amendment, or provision, on that subject, which he understood was agreeable to the President, according to his statement.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield.

Mr. LONG. Over in the House they passed one bill. That bill did have fertilizer in it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I am offering exactly the plan presented in the House bill. I have clipped it from the House bill and put it onto the bill now pending as an amendment. The chairman of the House committee stated, since the question has been raised on the floor, and it will be found in the debate, that the secretary of the President, the day before the bill was up for consideration, called him and said the President had confidence in the judgment of the Committee on Military Affairs, which had reported the bill which was then pending for consideration.

I think surely the Senator from Louisiana and everyone else recognizes that I have been as close and as ardent a follower of the President as any Senator on this floor since the very time he was inaugurated. No one can point to a single vote that has been cast here by me that was not in line, as I understood it, with what the President really, as a matter of principle, wanted done.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I am sure the Senator will agree with me that it would hardly be proper for us to engage in a controversy here over what the President wanted; although it is proper, if someone knows, to show it. I am not disputing that. I am not going to quote the President. I have great respect for the man who, even though he respects the President as much as I do, will not vote for a thing which he does not believe in, even if the President does. I believe, myself, that we ought to follow our own convictions. But since the matter has come up I should like to say to the Senator that I did not submit to the President subdivision (d), already agreed to by the Senate, but it happens, I think I can say, that I agree with the President on every proposition in the bill, particularly in the broad vision and scope which I think the President has in his mind—a national vision.

The President made some suggestion before he was inaugurated in regard to enlarging somewhat the scope of the bill. I am not claiming any credit for myself, but it just happened that the enlargements suggested were things which I had never put into the bill but which I had openly, many times in the Senate and a great many times elsewhere, publicly advocated. I was glad that we were going to have a President who would make it possible to add something to the bill which would broaden its scope and, in my judgment, in the end, especially for future generations, be of very material value to the happiness and comfort of the people.

There are some things in the bill which have been put in from time to time as we have had different controversies over different bills for the last 10 years, which went in as a matter of compromise. Some of them I did not like in the form in which they were in the bill, but I compromised and put them in.

One of the main compromises occurs in the particular section which the Senator would strike out of the bill, and for which he would insert the language of the House bill. Following the conference that was had with the President, I suggested the amendment which the Senate has agreed to, subdivision (d), on page 6, which I thought carried out 100 percent the ideas of the President. I would not have advocated these amendments if I had not agreed with the President, but they corresponded exactly with what I had tried to do for 10 years.

This subsection read, to begin with, nearly like the House provision, but we put into it an amendment day before yesterday so as to have the subdivision begin with these words, "In order to improve and cheapen the production of fertilizer." Then we struck out the word "shall" in line 24 and inserted in lieu thereof the words "is authorized to", so that as the bill stands now in its amended form it reads in this way:

"In order to improve and cheapen the production of fertilizer the board is authorized", and so forth. The Senator's amendment makes it compulsory, instead of giving them a simple authorization.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator read the rest of it, as it is now?

Mr. NORRIS. It reads:

In order to improve and cheapen the production of fertilizer the board is authorized to manufacture fixed nitrogen at Muscle Shoals by the employment of existing facilities, by modernizing existing plants, or by any other process or processes that in its judgment shall appear wise and profitable for the fixation of atmospheric nitrogen.

That is as it stands now in the bill. That is the language which the amendment of the Senator from Alabama would strike out.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes; because I want to include more than nitrogen.

Mr. NORRIS. I have no objection to the Senator's including something besides nitrogen, and I think the Senator understands my position clearly. If the Senator's amendment is agreed to, then the board will have no discretion; it will have to use nitrate plant no. 2 for the manufacture of fertilizer, even though it is done at a loss.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will my colleague yield for a question there?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. I understood the Senator from Nebraska to say that he would not object to authorizing the board, not making it compulsory, but authorizing the board to do something more than manufacture simply nitrogen.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I would have no objection to that.

Mr. BLACK. Would the Senator object to having an amendment at that point authorizing the manufacture of nitrogen or other fertilizer ingredients?

Mr. NORRIS. Not at all. I have no objection to that.

Mr. BLACK. I think that would greatly improve it and more nearly meet with the ideas we have.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alabama yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator has just heard the colloquy between the senior Senator from Alabama and the Senator from Nebraska. Why would not the suggestion provide everything that we want to provide for the farmers in this connection?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Because I want to know they are going to get it.

Mr. McKELLAR. This would authorize the board to act. If it is a success, we all know that the board is going to manufacture and sell these ingredients to the farmers, and if it is not a success we all know that they are not going to do it anyway, and they ought not to do it if it cannot be made a success. So it seems to me that with the amendment which the Senator from Nebraska has suggested he would agree to, there ought not to be any difference between us. That seems to me to be full and ample. If we are going to manufacture and sell fertilizer and fertilizer ingredients, that should be as much as we could possibly put into the bill at this time.

I call the attention of the Senator from Alabama to the fact that subsection (e), on page 7, reads as follows:

(e) Under the authority of this act the board may make donations or sales of the total product of the plant or plants operated by it to be fairly and equitably distributed through the agency of county demonstration agents, agricultural colleges, or otherwise as the board may direct, for experimentation, education, and introduction of the use of such products in cooperation with practical farmers so as to obtain information as to the value, effect, and best methods of use of same.

It seems to me that, with the amendment suggested by the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] and agreed to be accepted by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], it provides just what we desire to provide for the farmers of the country.

Mr. BANKHEAD. My view about what we desire to provide is very different from that of the Senator from Tennessee as he has just stated it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. May I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes, sir.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The principal difference between the Senator's pending amendment and the provision of the bill is, as I understand, that his amendment would require the manufacture of fertilizer for sale, whereas the provision of the bill contemplates experimentation in the production of fertilizer.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is correct, sir.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. If the experiment should not prove successful, would the Senator insist upon the manufacture of fertilizer for sale, even though it could not be economically produced?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I would not, Mr. President, after a fair trial.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Very well. What I am interested in is knowing why the authorization would not be sufficient.

Mr. BANKHEAD. My view is that the project is not really intended, under the present program, for the production of fertilizer. My view is—and it has been the view of the House since this program was originated all the way through—that we should provide for the compulsory production of fertilizer.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon me further?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Think of what would happen if the experiment should prove a failure; if it were found, as many contend will be the case, that fertilizer material could not be produced there on an economical basis or such a basis as would make it merchantable in competition with present methods elsewhere employed in the production of fertilizer! It would be a regrettable situation if the experiment should fail and at the same time the law should require the production of fertilizer for market purposes. What would be the advantage to the Government or to the public in having such a provision in the law? I am asking for information.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I could ask the Senator the same question about other provisions of the bill; for instance, the power provisions.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. But that would not answer the question which I have asked.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I know; but the same principle exactly is involved.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I might not be able to answer the Senator's question.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I think that both parts of the program will work.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. But assuming that the fertilizer experiment fails. I know that there are some so-called "scientists" who insist that under the conditions that prevail there fertilizer cannot be economically produced.

Mr. BANKHEAD. If the Senator will let me interrupt him there, he does not mean "fertilizer"; he means "nitrogen."

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I mean the elements of fertilizer.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Nitrogen is one element only of fertilizer.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. It is one element only of fertilizer. I accept the Senator's correction. But would the Senator insist, if that theory should be borne out by the experiment, that we should go ahead producing nitrogen, in spite of the fact that it could not be produced in competition with other places and other agencies?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Of course I concede, as I said before, that in that case it should be abandoned, which Congress can do, but we ought to have a declaration in the bill of the policy and purpose of Congress to bring about a fair trial and a fair effort to demonstrate whether or not the Muscle Shoals plant can be used for the benefit of agriculture.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I am in accord with that idea and I am perfectly ready to support any amendment that may be found necessary to carry it out; but what I am wondering is why, in view of the controversy that exists as to whether the experiment may or may not succeed, we should commit the Government to an unprofitable, unsuccessful undertaking in the manufacture of fertilizer and why that cannot be determined by future legislation if the experiment shall succeed. I am asking that question for information. It seems to me it is pertinent.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Very well. I shall be glad to undertake to answer the question, which I recognize is a fair one.

Mr. NORRIS. I have interrupted the Senator so often—

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the Senator from Nebraska let me answer the question of the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. NORRIS. I wanted to make a suggestion as to what I intended to do with regard to the matter.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The suggestion of the Senator from Nebraska may shorten the discussion.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Very well; I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I am going to offer an amendment which will take precedence over the Senator's motion, and if he will yield I will offer it now, and I think he will have no objection to it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes; I will do that.

Mr. NORRIS. Then on page 6, line 21, after the word "nitrogen" and the comma, I move to insert the words "fertilizer and fertilizer ingredients."

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator give me the page and line again?

Mr. NORRIS. Page 6, line 21, after the word "nitrogen", insert "fertilizer and fertilizer ingredients."

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator would it not be necessary to change the wording also in line 25?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I was just going to call the attention of the Senator from Nebraska to the fact that similar words should be added in line 25 after the word "nitrogen."

Mr. NORRIS. After the word "nitrogen", in line 25, I move to strike out the period and insert a comma and the words "or the cheapening of the production of fertilizer."

Mr. McKELLAR. That will be entirely acceptable.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, with that wording in—because the other points are otherwise provided for—I withdraw the substitute offered for subsection (d) about which we had some confusion here; but that does not dispose of the principle.

Mr. COOLIDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alabama yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BANKHEAD. If the Senator from Massachusetts desires to address himself to some other thought, I should like first to answer the Senator from Arkansas before we get away from his question, because he asked me a fair question.

Mr. COOLIDGE. I merely wish to say that the Muscle Shoals plant was originally built by the Government as an emergency undertaking. Muscle Shoals was a good site and it was a good business proposition for the Government to build the plant.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I should like to make a parliamentary inquiry. I do not know whether the amendment offered by me was formally agreed to. I will ask the Presiding Officer if it has been agreed to?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has not been agreed to.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course, it takes precedence over a motion to strike out. I will ask that the amendment be agreed to, on page 6, line 25, after the word "nitrogen", to strike out the period and insert a comma and the words "or the cheapening of the production of fertilizer."

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, may the words which the Senator proposes to add be reported again to the Senate?

Mr. NORRIS. I will state them. I propose to add the words "or the cheapening of the production of fertilizer."

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, has the first amendment offered by the Senator been agreed to? I refer to the amendment in line 21.

Mr. NORRIS. I think that was agreed to.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not think it was. May I inquire of the Chair whether the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska to come in in line 21 was agreed to?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment has not been stated from the desk and has not been agreed to.

Mr. McKELLAR. May it be stated from the desk and acted upon? I hope it may be put in the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 6, line 21, after the word "nitrogen", it is proposed to insert the words "fertilizer and fertilizer ingredients"; and on the same page, in line 25, after the word "nitrogen", to strike out the period and insert a comma and the words "or the cheapening of the production of fertilizer."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. May the Chair inquire whether the Senator from Alabama withdrew his amendment?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I withdraw the part offered as a substitute for subsection (d) which I sent up this morning.

Mr. COOLIDGE. Mr. President—

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. COOLIDGE. Mr. President, the Government apparently found it necessary to build a plant somewhere in order to make nitrates. The plant at Muscle Shoals was never intended, I believe, for anything except the production of chemicals, for the production of nitrates, which the Government needed and did not know of any other source from which it could get them.

I have watched for some years the proposed legislation in regard to Muscle Shoals. I have always believed that the Government should continue to own and maintain the plant there. I do not think it should lease that plant to anybody. The Government now needs it as an emergency plant, the same as when it built it. There is a power plant there and considerable water during a portion of the year, and that power plant is supplemented by a steam plant. It ought to be a chemical plant for the use of the Government at such times as the Government may need it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do not yield to the Senator for an argument; I myself am not through; I thought the Senator wanted to ask me a question.

Mr. COOLIDGE. What I am trying to set forth is my belief that this is a chemical plant and should be maintained by the Government as a chemical plant. It was never intended that the Government should build dams numbered 2, 3, and 4, involving a tremendous outlay of money, for any purpose except to provide a chemical plant, and there is no reason why the Government at Muscle Shoals should go into the business of producing electric power and sending it thousands of miles from the Tennessee Valley.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, to answer briefly the Senator from Massachusetts, I think the best evidence of the purpose of the construction of the plant at Muscle Shoals is the declaration contained in the law authorizing the appropriation. That declaration is—

For the production of nitrates or other products needed for munitions of war and useful in the manufacture of fertilizers—fertilizers and other useful products.

Mr. President, I regret the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] has been called from the Chamber, because I wanted to answer his inquiry. Of course, I will be forced to proceed in his absence, though I am particularly anxious to have his attention to that subject. He inquired if it would be advisable to proceed with the requirement for the manufacture of fertilizer at the Muscle Shoals plant without knowing in advance that it would be profitable.

There are several answers to that suggestion, Mr. President. In the first place, one must make up his judgment as to any product in which he intends to place his money, before putting it there, whether that project will be profitable. Here is a subject which has received the most careful consideration over a period of more than 10 long years. The committee at the other end of the Capitol has given it faithful attention; it has gone into every phase of the subject as to whether or not fertilizer can be produced profitably at Muscle Shoals.

I admit that since I have been a member of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry of the Senate no consideration has really been given to that subject by any hearings or any discussion in that committee except by one witness who set out in the hearings, as will be found therein, tables and statements and letters, including one from the Bureau of Chemistry, that nitrogen could be produced at Muscle Shoals at $5 a ton less than the farmers in that section were paying for it. So far as I know, that is the only evidence that has been before the committee since I have been a member of it which dealt with the subject of the cost of production there and with a detailed itemized statement of cost, submitted to an unfriendly bureau of the Government, which stated the figures in the letter were correct. The correspondence is in the hearings. As the result of the investigations at the other end of the Capitol they have always insisted in incorporating in the Muscle Shoals bills a provision for the compulsory production of fertilizer at Muscle Shoals.

Mr. President, I want to bring to the attention of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], if I may, a further consideration in addition to the statement of the investigations heretofore had and the judgment of those who investigated at the other end of the Capitol. I invite his attention and the attention of other Senators to the fact that nitrate is only one of the necessary elements of fertilizer. I will give the proportion, for the information of Senators, based upon the average of fertilizer sold during 1931-32, as follows: Nitrogen, 3.31 percent; phosphoric acid, 9.25 percent; potash, 3.87 percent, which shows that really the largest element in the production of fertilizer is not nitrogen, but phosphoric acid.

Here are the prices per unit for the three elements: Nitrogen, $2.60 per unit of 20 pounds; phosphoric acid, $1.30; potash, $1.09. Here is the cost of the three elements by units: Nitrogen, $8.62; phosphoric acid, $12.10; potash, $4.22.

It will be seen that the cost of phosphoric acid in the average fertilizer used throughout the country was almost as high in 1931-32 as both nitrogen and potash combined. So I say it is not fair to base this question solely upon the cost of production of nitrogen at that plant in the manufacture of fertilizer. Here we have evidence submitted by the Bureau of Chemistry, an unfriendly Bureau, showing that we can produce even nitrogen itself at $5 a ton less than it is being sold to the farmers of Alabama.

I submit further the statement that the American Cyanamid Co. at Niagara Falls, with exactly the same process, is making nitrogen there and shipping it into all the Southern States as well as into various other sections of the country. If a plant of the same type is in successful operation, if it is taking business a thousand miles away from its location, what right have we to assume here, in enacting legislation relative to a plant of exactly the same kind, that we should not declare that the plant should be put to use in the interest of the farmers of the country?

There is a provision in the amendment authorizing the production of phosphoric acid in addition to nitrogen. Let us see about phosphoric acid. There within 50 miles on the Tennessee River, offering cheap water transportation, are the phosphate-rock beds of the State of Tennessee with unlimited quantities of phosphate rock which could be brought down the river to this plant for the production of concentrated fertilizer. I submit that in addition to phosphoric rock there is also available limestone, one of the other necessary elements, in a quarry owned by the Government, formerly operated and ready to operate again. There within 100 miles are the coal and coke which are large elements in the production of both phosphoric acid and nitrogen through the electric process.

Adjacent to the location of this great Government plant, built for the use of the farmers in time of peace, are all of the available elements except potash, and that must be imported. Everything needed for the production of nitrogen and phosphoric acid is right there in the immediate vicinity. For the benefit of the farmers, in order to get a good price for them if possible, the amendment provides that if any one of the elements of fertilizer can be bought cheaper than it can be produced at this plant, then the purchase of that one element is authorized. That gives to the operation, whether by the board or by a lessee, every latitude to bring together at the very lowest price all the necessary elements, the phosphoric acid as well as the nitrogen.

So I submit, Mr. President, that there should be no reluctance upon the part of the Congress in going ahead and declaring the purpose and the policy of the Congress to use this nitrate plant for the benefit of the farmers. We are all interested in the benefits to accrue to the people of the towns and rural communities where cheap electricity can be carried. Having in mind the long struggle by those who believe that the farmers can be benefited from the operation of this plant, I feel earnestly that we should provide not only for the town people and others as contemplated under the power provisions of the bill but for the farmers as well. I welcome the benefits for the town people; I want them to have the lowest possible price for their electricity; but I do believe that we should also give every possible benefit from that great investment directly to agriculture.

Some Senators may have an idea that the distribution of the fertilizer is purely a local matter. I am not going to take the time to read the hearings on that point, but it was shown that the concentrated fertilizer can be shipped a thousand miles, as far away as Wisconsin, showing that by reason of the great saving in freight rates we can ship 1 ton of the concentrated fertilizer as against  $4\frac{1}{4}$  tons of mixed fertilizer. I am basing this argument upon the belief that concentrated fertilizers can be produced at Muscle Shoals. The fertilizer industry contends that fertilizer ought to be more concentrated; that it is economical to pursue that course of manufacture. Their reason for not doing it is based solely upon the sales resistance by the farmer. But with the Government behind a great project like this, with all its agents scattered everywhere to teach the farmers the value of the use of concentrated fertilizer, with nobody arguing successfully against the economy and value of concentrated fertilizer—I say with all those agencies available to inform the farmers of the savings involved in this program—and even without it as time passes on and they come to know of the saving in the use of concentrated fertilizer and how to apply concentrated fertilizer—I submit, Mr. President, that before many years the use of this form of highly concentrated fertilizer will spread all over the country.

No one needs to argue about the necessity for fertilizer. Since 1919 the production of wheat has decreased in the East about 20,000,000 acres and the production has moved to the West. As time goes on, as the result of erosion and exhaustion of the soil, the productivity of the land becomes less and less and the whole trend is toward a new country, toward new and fresh lands. Any thoughtful student of the program must realize that year after year the question of more and cheaper and better fertilizer is an increasingly important one. No subject before American agriculture is of greater importance. We all recognize that no subject is of more importance to all the people of the country.

If we can ship this fertilizer a thousand miles, as is estimated in a statement in the hearings, at 40 percent below what we have to pay now for mixed fertilizers, which contain nearly 80 percent of the inert matter and filler upon which we must pay the same freight rates—if there is any reasonable hope of accomplishing that result, we certainly should try it. Many of us firmly believe that it can be done, whether we can produce nitrogen with this process or not. If we cannot produce it as cheaply, then we authorize the board to buy it. No one can deny that phosphoric acid, the chief element in weight, the chief element in price, with all the elements for its production, can be produced cheaper at Muscle Shoals probably than at any other location in the entire United States, with the river being opened to navigation, and low rates, with the concentration of all of these natural resources, and with that plant put there to be used in peace times for this specific purpose—the production of the elements of fertilizer. The other House year after year has stood for that program; and the Senate, in acting on the last two bills that went to the President and were vetoed, has incorporated in them this very compulsory plan for production of fertilizer, not in the language of this bill, but calling for the production of a fixed and minimum quantity of nitrogen.

I am not going to take any more of the time of the Senate. I sincerely hope, however, that the farmers will be given an opportunity to benefit not only by the distribution of electricity in such rural communities as can afford it, but also by giving to them the opportunity that we believe is there for securing cheaper fertilizers, for a reduction in their cost of production. I hope the Senate will see its way clear to agree with the House upon this subject, and let us dispose of it once for all.

Mr. NORRIS obtained the floor.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, if the Senator from Nebraska will yield for that purpose, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POPE in the chair). The absence of a quorum being suggested, the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-nine Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD].

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I do not desire to detain the Senate any longer than is absolutely necessary to have them understand what would happen if the amendment of the Senator from Alabama were agreed to.

The part of the amendment that the Senator withdrew is still, in another form, in the amendment, as I read it.

Everything that it seems to me we are justified in doing is to authorize this board, in carrying out its experiments, to use any facility, any instrumentality, that is possible to cheapen the production of fertilizer. If, however, we compel the board to operate plant no. 2 at Muscle Shoals to produce nitrogen, which is all it is fit for without remodeling, and is all it was designed for, we will find—the testimony to this effect is almost unanimous, and I think it is unanimous when it comes from disinterested sources—that we shall have to produce every pound of it at a pecuniary loss over a more modern process.

Originally, when we commenced to get nitrogen from the atmosphere, it was done by the arc process. That is the oldest process. Nitrogen can be produced yet by the arc process, but it is exceedingly expensive. It can only be done economically where power, of which it requires a vast amount, is practically worthless for other purposes and has no market value. But that is the only process that was known originally. Time passed, and the cyanamide process was invented. That is the process utilized at nitrate plant no. 1 at Muscle Shoals.

At the beginning of the World War we did not know anything about the Haber process, or, as it is almost always called, the synthetic process. That was not known. The most modern way known of getting nitrogen from the atmosphere was through the cyanamide process, and that was the state of the knowledge when we built nitrate plant no. 2 and undertook the improvement at Muscle Shoals. That plant was designed to produce 40,000 tons of nitrogen per annum. It will do that. It fulfills all the calculations made for it.

We got into the war and it became common knowledge among all our allies and ourselves that Germany had some cheaper way of making nitrogen because by the fleets of the allied nations she was shut off from Chile, the world's source of supply of nitrogen at that time. We did not know about that German process until the war was over. When the war had ended our scientists went all through the plants in Germany, and immediately the newer process, the Haber process, began to be developed all over the world. I think the first plant in this country was at Syracuse.

The cyanamide process, a big improvement over the arc process, required still a large amount of power, but not nearly as much power as the arc process. The Haber process required still less power. In fact power is not considered an important item in the cost of production under that process. About all that is needed is power to operate the machinery. There has to be some steam used in that process. They use low-pressure steam; and the raw material, instead of being power, is coke. Cheap coke is necessary in order to get cheap nitrogen from the atmosphere by the synthetic process.

Since the close of the war, the synthetic process has been developing, gradually increasing, and improving. Men have gone into the business all over the world, including our own country, of getting nitrogen from the atmosphere, and of course they proceed on a business basis. I think it is safe to follow them. They would not do it for fun. They did not have to do it as the Government had to do it in time of war in order to get explosives. So they took the process that was the cheapest, and the most scientific, and they have improved that. There have been various modifications of it, and it has been very much improved.

We have at Muscle Shoals nitrate plant no. 2, which gets nitrogen out of the atmosphere by the cyanamide process. It is out-of-date, and, let me repeat, I am not blaming anybody for urging that we build it. Our Government did the best it could. It feared that it might be short of explosives and have to have nitrogen, and it devised that plant, the most modern we knew anything about at that time. I should be glad if it were still a good plant. I am not making these assertions because I am glad these conditions have come about. I regret that that nitrate plant is out-of-date. I wish it were a modern plant and could be cheapened; but we must face the scientific facts.

Mr. President, I did not expect to go into this matter, but the Senator's amendment has made it necessary that I produce the facts. I regret exceedingly that the Senator has offered his amendment. Yesterday we prevented the adoption of an amendment which would have stricken out of the bill section 13, if it had been agreed to. I did everything I could to keep that section in the bill. Some Senators were in favor of striking it out, and I concede that everyone who voted for the amendment voted in good faith. It is a question which has two sides. But if there is any advantage between States, Alabama and Tennessee get the advantage. I opposed the amendment because it seemed to me it was fair that something should be paid in lieu of taxes. But almost any State would be glad to have this great improvement within its borders.

I do not question anybody's good faith, but it seems to me that Representatives from Alabama and Tennessee ought to think a long while before they try to put an amendment onto this bill which would compel the Government of the United States to manufacture fertilizer and produce nitrogen from the atmosphere by that antiquated system at Muscle Shoals, which I think I will be able to demonstrate would mean a loss on every ton ever produced. Yet if the pending amendment is agreed to, we are going to compel the taxpayers of the United States to contribute their hard-earned taxes to pay the expenses of this losing proposition for the benefit of the farmers within shipping distance of Muscle Shoals. That is not fair. I think the farmers of Alabama and of Tennessee, if they considered it in an unbiased manner, would realize that it was not fair. The taxpayers of Maine and New York and California and Kansas have their money in that investment down there.

In my judgment, we are not justified in using it to go into the fertilizer business for the assistance of farmers within a radius of two or three hundred miles of nitrate plant no. 2, even though I should be glad to assist them. That is doubly so when I think it can be demonstrated as a scientific fact that we cannot by that system produce fertilizer at such a cost that it will be able to undersell fertilizer which has been on the market at any time since that great plant was constructed. Yet that is what the amendment means. It means more than that, but that would be the effect.

Mr. President, a large part of the power generated there would be used to produce nitrogen by an antiquated system. The modern system would require no power, except the power necessary to operate the machinery, but to operate cyanamide plant no. 2 would require, as I remember it, somewhere in the neighborhood of 80,000 horsepower to operate it at capacity, producing a product which we would have to sell at a loss, making it impossible to use the power anywhere else.

Mr. President, can Senators see where the Power Trust is interested in this amendment? Is it not a fact that the Power Trust—while they would rather have the power themselves—if they cannot get it, would like to see the Government utilize it where it would not do anybody any good and do them no harm?

Mr. President, I have an abundance of scientific testimony running through the hearings of many years, all to the effect that nitrate plant no. 2 has been superseded by a newer system. Since we constructed that plant, since the synthetic process has been known, not a single nitrate plant to operate under the cyanamide process has been constructed in the United States, not one. We own the only one there is. On the other hand, eight synthetic-process plants have been established, and some others have been considered as business ventures, so that there are produced by the synthetic process in the United States, in round numbers, 190,000 tons of nitrates a year. That is 190,000 tons more than we had capacity for under any process before we went into the war.

Mr. President, those plants are operating on a business basis, so that we would not be confronted, even in case of war, with the danger with which we were confronted when we entered the World War, because we have a possible production in privately owned plants in the United States that would more than supply all the uses of the Army and the Navy even in time of war. We built nitrate plant no. 2, with 40,000 tons capacity, with a view to taking care of the needs of our Army and Navy for explosives.

Mr. President, I want to show the Senate just how these various systems have developed. I want to read now from Dr. P. E. Howard, of the Bureau of Chemistry and Soils, in our own Department of Agriculture, right here in Washington. In the 41 countries listed by Dr. Howard, there was a total world consumption during 1928 of 7,770,000 tons of plant food, which would amount to 43,000,000 tons of fertilizer, assuming the average plant-food content to be 18 percent.

Germany, the United States, and France, with one tenth of the world population, use more than one half of the world's supply of fertilizer. The total value of world production is estimated at $592,000,000.

The world production of fixed nitrogen has increased during the 20-year period from 1909-29 from 239,250 tons to 1,785,300 tons. About 87 percent of the nitrogen is used in agriculture. At the end of 1929 there were 121 nitrogen-fixation plants in 18 countries with a total capacity of 2,203,900 tons.

There were seven nitrogen-fixation plants in operation in the United States during 1929.

There are eight now.

A new plant began producing in 1930. All of these plants use the direct ammonia synthetic process.

Not a single one of them uses the cyanamide process.

Muscle Shoals nitrate plant no. 1 was the first direct synthetic ammonia-fixation plant built in the United States, and although it was a failure—

I told the Senate about that yesterday. When we did not know how to proceed, we did the best we could, but we could not get behind the German armies and find out how they were making nitrogen, and at nitrate plant no. 1 we made a failure.

Nitrate plant no. 2, under the cyanamide process, that we knew all about, was not a failure. Although nitrate plant no. 1 was a failure, it served as a forerunner for the great industry that has developed here in the last few years.

During 1929 the consumption of inorganic nitrogen in the United States amounted to approximately 452,261 tons. Domestic production was 271,600 tons.

I have a table here, if anyone is interested in it, showing in detail the production all over the world, but I do not believe it is necessary to read it. I want to show how these three systems of obtaining nitrogen from the air have been developed. As I said, the old arc process is still used but is going down. The cyanamide process, developed later and requiring less power, went up and up for a good many years until the synthetic process was developed. Then the synthetic process gradually climbed up until it is now away in the lead all over the civilized world.

The arc process in 1909 produced 3,300 tons of nitrogen. That was not very much for the world. The cyanamide process, then just starting, was second. It produced 2,750 tons. The synthetic process produced nothing; it was unknown in 1909.

In 1913 let us see how production progressed. The arc process produced 19,800 tons; the cyanamide process increased its production to 66,000 tons; and the synthetic process, then in its infancy, produced 7,700 tons. It was third, it will be observed.

Take the next table, for 1917. The arc process produced 33,000 tons; the cyanamide process increased rapidly over its previous production, and in 1917 produced 220,000 tons; and the new process, the synthetic process, made the greatest percentage of increase of all, producing 121,000 tons.

Now, coming to the year 1924, in that year the arc process produced 33,000 tons, the same as before; the cyanamide process produced 136,400 tons. It will be noted that production under that process fell off nearly 100,000 tons. Why? Because the new process was taking the place of all the others, and in that year the synthetic process produced 275,100 tons.

In 1929 the arc process produced still the same amount, 33,000 tons; the cyanamide process produced 264,000 tons; and the synthetic process produced 1,018,000 tons. So it took the lead, and it has maintained it ever since.

No chemist on earth would now think of building a plant like nitrate plant no. 2. I had a conference this morning with one of the leading chemical engineers of the United States. I welcomed the opportunity to confer with him because I knew this amendment was coming up. I asked him about it. I asked, "How much more does it cost to produce nitrogen by the cyanamide process than by the synthetic process?" He said, "It costs more than 50 percent more." Now we are asked to vote for an amendment that would compel the board to manufacture fertilizer the nitrogen content of which would be produced at nitrate plant no. 2 at a cost that would be more than 50 percent of what the Government could go out and buy the nitrogen for in the market. Is that proper business? Is that what we desire to put the Government of the United States into? The Government can go out today and buy in the open market all the nitrogen that nitrate plant no. 2 will produce, and save 50 percent in cash. That is the proposition which is before the Senate; that is what we are going to be called on to vote for. I cannot understand how a man from a State which will get great benefit out of this great improvement, a State which is in the great Tennessee Valley where the agencies to be set up are going to try to improve navigation and forestation, to reclaim land and apply it to useful purposes, and to insure the development of large amounts of electricity for use in the home and in the factories—I cannot understand how a man coming from such a State should deliberately ask Senators to vote for an amendment that will take 80,000 horsepower of that which will be produced at Muscle Shoals and devote it to the purpose of producing nitrogen which the Government can go out and buy for 50 cents as against every dollar it will cost to produce a unit. Mr. President, it does not seem to me to be reasonable; it does not seem to me that we ought to do it.

The Senator spoke of the cost of nitrogen in the production of agricultural fertilizer. I want to call the attention of the Senate to just how the cost of a ton of fertilizer may be divided. One of the common forms of fertilizer which is used by the farmer is what is known as "4-8-4." That means that there are 4 units of nitrogen, 8 units of phosphorus, and 4 units of potash in the fertilizer. Those are the three constituents of a certain grade of agricultural fertilizer; they represent the quantity of plant food. There is a lot of dirt in it with which it is necessary to mix the fertilizer and increase freight, and so forth, but the plant food that is in it is known by the formula "4-8-4."

Now, let us take a ton of fertilizer and assume that it cost $17.60 and is made up of nitrogen, phosphorus, and potash, and let us see where we come out. The potash in such a ton of fertilizer would cost $3.20; the phosphoric acid would cost $4; the nitrogen would cost $10.40. So, when the Senator says that phosphoric acid is the cheap product under present prices, I think he has another guess coming.

The greatest possibility for a reduction in the cost of fertilizer is the cheapening of nitrogen. It would help to cheapen the potash ingredient and to cheapen the phosphorous ingredient, but the greatest help that could come would be to cheapen the product of the fertilizer which costs the most, and the nitrogen cost is greater than the cost of the other two ingredients put together. We have a plant at Muscle Shoals that will produce nitrogen by the cyanamid process at a cost at least twice as great as we know it can now be produced by the synthetic process. I know that over this broad country propaganda has been circulated for 12 years that if we would just start up nitrate plant no. 2 we could make fertilizer almost for nothing. Millions of honest farmers have been made to believe that statement. It is not true now, and it never was true. A man may believe it to be true, and he may be honest and conscientious about it until he knows the facts; but I cannot see, when he faces the record, how he can believe any such thing.

Mr. President, if I had any prejudice about it, I never knew it. I have had no personal interest in it. This project has no direct application to the section of the country from which I come. I certainly cannot be charged with having a selfish interest. I know that in every campaign I have been in since I have been connected with Muscle Shoals legislation I have been condemned over the prairies of Nebraska by partisans and by partisan newspapers because I took an interest in Muscle Shoals, because they said I was not doing something for my own State. I have tried from the very beginning, as I am trying now, to carry out a program in connection with this matter which will benefit the farmers of America as a whole. I am interested in the farmers of Alabama, but I am no more interested in them than I am in the farmers of New York, or than I am in the farmers of Tennessee or Nebraska or Iowa. I thought there was an opportunity here to do something for all the farmers of America. I do not believe we can do that if we take their money and put it into a losing venture and sell fertilizer at a loss. Even though it may help a few farmers, we are not justified in doing it. No honest man will expect us to do it. All we have got to do is to proclaim the truth and nothing else.

The bill as it now stands—and as I hope it will remain—will employ Government funds for experimentation on a large practical scale. I know that things are brought forth from the laboratory which do not work when it comes to bulk production. I have seen chemists testifying before the Agricultural Committee show their little bottles of concentrated fertilizer, but the farmers are not using that on their crops. I hope they will be able to do so at some time; I hope by our experimentation we may enable them to do that and save freight, because 80 percent of the freight is paid on the worthless dirt that is used to mix with the fertilizers.

I believe we are justified in cheapening the cost of fertilizer. It is a broad world to enter; it has wonderful possibilities. I know that chemists and chemical engineers have been working on it all over the world for years, but nobody except the Government is able to make the experimentation on a large scale. I have no connection—nobody has ever charged that I have had—with any fertilizer corporation; but I can see how a fertilizer company is not justified in making experiments such as this bill provides the Government shall make. Everybody knows that probably nine tenths of experiments fail; we do not expect them always to succeed. Sometimes, as I said a moment ago, chemists are able to produce in a laboratory something that seems to be perfect, and yet it takes years of experimentation before the article thus brought forth produces any practical benefit to anybody.

I want to ask the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKEL-LAR], who honors me with his presence, if he represented a corporation in which the stock was held by the various Members of this body who had contributed their money for use in the fertilizer business, if he were managing it, whether he would feel justified in taking our money and entering upon an experiment that might cost hundreds of thousands of dollars? He might believe it would succeed. If he tried it, it might succeed, but the chances are it would fail. But he would not try it—of course he would not, because he is an honest man.

Men and women who put their money into that kind of an institution cannot afford to have experiments made, but the Government, in behalf of all the people of the United States, can afford to make such experiments. We have been expending public money for all kinds of experiments ever since I have been in public life. Since I have been a member of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry we have taken volumes of testimony on the cost of potash, one of the elements of fertilizer, indeed a necessary element. We get it mostly from Germany. It is a sad thought that we have to go to a foreign country to get this necessary element. I would be willing to spend millions of public money in order to discover potash in the United States and make us independent of the world in that regard, as well as independent of corporations and trusts that combine and have in the past and will in the future combine to raise the price to our farmers.

The Committee on Agriculture and Forestry have reported measures authorizing the expenditure of thousands and hundreds of thousands of dollars in the effort to find potash beds in various sections of the United States. We have spent the money and discovered some potash beds. During the war, when we were cut off from Germany and could not get potash from that source, we obtained potash from lakes in my own State, lakes in sand hills impregnated with potash. The water was pumped out and potash obtained. It was thought for a while that there was a great bonanza there. Fertilizer went almost to the sky in price. The Nebraska potash was sold for a good price; but when the war ended and potash began to come in again from foreign countries, that Nebraska institution failed.

There again I met with my own people and had a controversy with them. Some of my friends lost all the money they had invested in those potash beds. If they could have gotten the prices they received during the war, they would have been millionaires. The first thing that many of them did was to ask for an enormous tariff to be levied on the importation of potash. I had many a bitter controversy with my own constituents. I refused to stand for a tariff on potash. Indeed, I was in favor of putting potash on the free list, because it seemed to me we were not justified, in order to help a few good, honest people in my own State, in levying a tribute upon every farmer in the United States. So the potash works there have ceased to exist and the money invested is all gone.

Public money has been spent in Texas, in Utah, in Nevada, and other sections of the West and South trying to discover potash beds, all for the benefit of the farmer, and incidentally for the benefit of the consumer as well, because the consumer has to pay, and ought to pay, the farmer for his food products, together with a profit, which unfortunately he is not getting at this time.

If we could cheapen fertilizer, we would help everybody. Here is a plan which may fail. We must honestly admit that. I have no doubt that most of the experiments will fail; but, if we can cheapen the production of nitrogen from the atmosphere, we will help every farmer in the United States who has to use fertilizer and we will help every consumer who has to buy the products of the farm. Therefore it is a national question. I have been considering it as a national question from the beginning. It hurts me to think we might have a proposition here that would compel the use of the taxpayers' money in an experiment which we know in advance is going to fail.

I have no objection to the leasing of nitrate plant no. 2. I realize, however certain I may be from my studies of 10 years, that we cannot produce nitrogen there to compete with nitrogen which can be produced by the synthetic process; but I hear Senators and others say that we can. However, I believe they are biased; I believe they are prejudiced; I believe they have been deceived by the national propaganda which the American Farm Bureau Federation for 10 years has spread over the country. But Senators and others who make that statement are honest about it. I realize after all, with all the evidence I have in my possession and all the studies I have made, that I may be mistaken. So I am willing to authorize the board to lease nitrate plant no. 2. It may be that some new invention will come along which will improve the cyanamide process. I would be very happy if it could be developed. It would make nitrate plant no. 2 of some value.

In the bill we have authorized the board in its discretion to get nitrogen out of the atmosphere by the use of any method on earth, and that, of course, includes the cyanamide process. But if I am wrong, if nitrate plant no. 2 can produce nitrogen cheaper than by any other method, of course I want it utilized. The Farm Bureau Federation never advocated that the Government should do it. Even the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], who has offered the amendment that directs the Government to do it, says he thinks it could better be done by private parties.

I have on my desk an amendment which I have prepared, which would authorize the President of the United States to lease nitrate plant no. 2 to the American Farm Bureau Federation or to any corporation it might organize. Under the terms of the amendment he could make such a lease at $1 a year, and we would agree to furnish power as cheaply as we furnish it to anybody else, in like quantity and of the same quality. When the pending amendment shall be disposed of, if it shall be defeated, as I sincerely hope it will be, I am going to offer that amendment. Personally I do not anticipate anything occurring under it, but I would like to call the bluff of the American Farm Bureau Federation, if it is a bluff. If it is not a bluff, if they are in earnest, then for God's sake let them lease it, and if they succeed no one in the world will be more delighted than I.

Mr. President, I hope the amendment of the Senator from Alabama will be defeated.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I have been very much interested in the debate that has gone on in reference to the use of the Muscle Shoals plant.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-nine Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, as I said, I was very much interested in this discussion about Muscle Shoals and the use of the power there for the production of nitrogen or for the production of hydroelectric power.

I have been amazed to hear the discussion as to the use of the cyanamide plant. I presume there are very few in this body who are interested in the production of fertilizer, judging from the discussion I have heard on this floor, and the importance it has assumed. Only those are interested who are dependent upon the use of it for the production of a crop and the fertilization of their soil, who know the absolute necessity of using artificial chemical fertilizer from the coast of Maine to Florida and back into the interior as far as the mountain range.

When I introduced the first bill that became law for the establishment of a plant or plants for the extraction of nitrogen from the air, there were two reasons why it seemed absolutely essential that this should be done. One has been discussed here very freely—the necessity of our Government to have nitrogen, which is the basis of all high-power explosives. The other was the necessity of agriculture in every form to have artificial fertilizer, not alone on the Atlantic seaboard, but to a rapidly increasing extent in the more or less depleted soil of the Middle West and the West. The problem was how to furnish the people of this country with an artificial fertilizer, which is now so very essential, as population has increased and we are becoming more or less standardized, and the land in cultivation cannot be diversified as it was during our colonial period. Then, when a piece of land was worn out, it was thrown out of use, and a new piece was brought under cultivation. Now the same land has to be cultivated from year to year; and the question was, how to take from the soil every year millions of tons of fertilization in the form of the finished product without depleting the soil; how to put back in the soil the elements essential to growth.

For years and years we have been rotating, planting the legumes and turning them under, for the purpose of fertilization. That is not practicable throughout the Atlantic seaboard. Therefore the great problem has been how we could chemically keep these soils up to a high state of production at the least possible cost.

All of you know, or should know, that the prime essential in all plant food is nitrogen, or its convertible feature, ammonia. Ammonia is readily convertible in chemical terms into nitrogen. When I introduced this bill, it was introduced for the purpose of ending our dependence upon Chile for our supply of that essential feature in explosives, which meant the public defense. During the World War we were absolutely dependent upon our importations of Chilean nitrates for the explosives we made. It was an experimental time. There had been discovered a process by which nitrogen could be taken from the air, but it was in the empirical or experimental stage; and the first successful one—that is, the first one that produced nitrogen in such quantities and at such a price as to compete with the imported Chilean nitrate—was the cyanamide process at Niagara Falls. Like all scientific experimentation, however, the mind of genius was excited, and began to seek a solution of the problem of how to drive the nitrogen away from the oxygen of the air, how to get it in such a form that it could be held and bound and then made available for crop purposes.

The experimenters first took lime, and, after using tremendous heats in an electric furnace, in order by the very power of heat to drive off, in the absence of a more acceptable method, the nitrate from the oxygen, they found that they could combine nitrogen in this lime form and produce what was known as "cyanamide." That being the best process with which our scientists at that time were acquainted, we constructed the cyanamide plant at Muscle Shoals. Then the war came to an end; and immediately, just as soon as this great power had been developed and dedicated, as the original bill did dedicate it, to the production of nitrogen to defend this country in time of war and to aid farmers in time of peace, just as soon as the war was over and the driving necessity for this ingredient in time of war disappeared, the battle began as to whether or not the Government would carry out its solemn pledge and promise to the American people, which promise, I maintain, is as imperative now as it was the day of the passage of the bill.

Upon whom are we dependent now for explosives? What plant has the Government that it could utilize in time of war for the purpose of manufacturing enough nitrogen for the use of the Army and Navy and our home defense?

Before I go into that, however, the argument has been made here that because we cannot use nitrate plant no. 2, because it is obsolete, because it is out of date by reason of the rapid progress of the discoveries of science, therefore we must not produce any nitrogen at Muscle Shoals.

Suppose the Government had kept faith with the American people, had developed that plant, and had kept pace with the development of the various processes of extracting nitrogen from the air. Would we have been today in a position to say that our investment there was obsolete? As a matter of course, we would have kept step with the discoveries of science and the modern method of extracting nitrogen from the air through the use of a catalyst. That is some form of chemical which, it has been discovered, has the power of breaking down the combination of oxygen and nitrogen in an amazingly, miraculously cheap way. To such an extent has this process been improved that within the past 12 years it has reduced the cost of this ingredient 50 percent.

Ammonium phosphate, one of the forms in which nitrogen is used for the purpose of aiding agriculture, has reduced almost by half the price of nitrate of soda that has been imported from Chile and that is used by all the farmers throughout this country from Maine to Florida. The process of extracting nitrogen from the air and producing ammonium phosphate has been carried so far that it has almost cut in two the price to the farmer; and yet that process is owned, used, and controlled today by those who have invested their money and done the "dead work", who are doing it for a profit to themselves, and who knows what the cost is?

This process, as all the figures here will show, has reduced the cost of production of this ingredient to a point where the use of inorganic atmospheric nitrogen has risen from one half of 1 percent in 1913 to 60 percent today of all the nitrogen used in fertilizing processes. That gives you some idea of the progress of the art, and the consequent relief to agriculture; and yet we stand on this floor and argue about the use of a plant that was as good as any when it was constructed but is completely obsolete and out of date now!

What is the obvious duty of this Government? If we are to carry out the pledge of the original and basic law, we can easily avail ourselves of the processes by which private individuals have practically cut in two the price of this ingredient; and if we do not want to go any farther, we can by the installation of these simple devices determine what is the cost of fertilizer as well as dedicating this bill to determining the cost of power.

The process of extracting nitrogen from the air has passed the empirical stage. I think all chemists will agree that we cannot go farther than the discovery of a catalyst which breaks down the oxygen and the nitrogen of the air, and in the presence of certain steam preparations produces ammonia, which is the hydrated form of nitrogen. It has passed the empirical stage; and in a granulated form as beautiful as pearl grits it is being shipped throughout the country to the absolute lowering of the price of all forms of ammonium or nitrogen-carrying fertilizers.

What is the use of standing on this floor and arguing about the utilization of an obsolete plant? If it is obsolete, what is our duty? To get the up-to-date method and determine for the farmers what is the real cost.

Mr. President, just last spring the fertilizer people of this country were petitioning Members of Congress to invoke the antidumping law because foreign countries were pouring this form of ammonia into this country at a cost that gave to those who were dependent upon fertilizer at least some hope of fertilizing their land without mortgaging their lives to the fertilizer producers. I have here from the Department of Agriculture a statement that 18 percent of the cost of producing crops in the South Atlantic States is due to the cost of the fertilizer.

Mr. President, as a matter of course, I understand that very few men in the Senate know anything about the fertilizer problem, and they do not care, because they have not personally felt the intolerable burden of having to buy the ingredients necessary to fertilize the soil or abandon their farms. It is a curious fact that along the South Atlantic, without artificial fertilizer, the lands are worthless, and that with fertilizer they are the highest producing spots in the United States. With the use of this very element of nitrogen, Jerry Moore, in my State, on a "black jack" bottom, made 230 bushels of corn on 1 acre. Mr. Drake, of Marlboro, S.C., with the use of this very ingredient, made 250 bushels of corn on 1 acre. With the use of phosphoric acid, potash, and ammonia or nitrogen, the last two being interchangeable terms, from 4 to 5 bales of cotton have been produced on 1 acre of sandy soil in the Carolinas. I dare submit today that any practical farmer—I do not mean economists, or experts, or professors, but I mean a real, true-to-God dirt farmer—will testify that you can take this ingredient and, on a sand hill, which has only the power by capillary attraction of keeping the moisture there, make a crop with nitrogen.

Mr. President, gentlemen talk about experimentation. I claim that not only should there be still further governmental experimentation but, if we are to produce, transmit, and sell power, we should produce, transmit, and sell fertilizer. The principles are identically the same, and, in the name of God, if the Government is to go into the business of helping anybody, it is that class who are dependent upon fertilizer for their living, for more than 15,000,000 homesteads who should be helped.

There has been much talk about nitrate plant no. 1 and nitrate plant no. 2. They are both obsolete and out of date, but I claim that by the catalyst method fertilizer can be produced with a minimum of power and a maximum of results. Therefore, what is the logic? If under the old process it would take practically all of the power of Muscle Shoals to produce an amount of nitrogen not sufficient to meet the needs of the United States, and if today, by the production of the power necessary to produce a unit of nitrogen, Muscle Shoals can be geared up under the new synthetic process to produce enough nitrogen to meet all the needs of America, and it can do it, and all the needs of the Army and Navy, what right have we to say that, because the process is so cheap, it would be produced anywhere? That is a greater argument why we should not use all this power which the people have contributed their money to develop for the specific purpose of furnishing our Army and Navy with an abundance of explosives, and, under the testimony of our own experts, this very nitrogen used under the synthetic process can be used for the manufacture of explosives as readily as or more readily than we have been using it for all these years.

Chile has charged us from eight to eleven dollars a ton export duty, and we were dependent upon that source. Today, with Muscle Shoals in operation producing nitrogen under the synthetic process and using it in the manufacture of modern explosives, who is here to say that we would not be justified in doing what is proposed?

I am not going to discuss the question of the obsolescence of nitrate plant no. 1 or nitrate plant no. 2. It is our duty, if they are out of date, to scrap them and use the modern process.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. I do not want to have any argument at this point, except to state that I have before me the fertilizer yearbook for 1932, and, instead of the cyanamid process being wholly obsolete in 1931, there were shipped into this country, according to this book, 51,314 tons, and the capacity of the plant at Muscle Shoals is only 40,000 tons.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I was just saying that that was the argument. If they have modified the cyanamid process so that there can be competition with the synthetic process, I have not a word to say; but I have risen for the purpose of pointing out to this body wherein lies the difference in principle between producing power, transmitting and selling it, and manufacturing fertilizer, and transmitting and selling it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD].

Mr. LONG. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk called the roll.

RELIEF OF UNEMPLOYMENT

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 4606) to provide for cooperation by the Federal Government with the several States and Territories and the District of Columbia in relieving the hardship and suffering caused by unemployment, and for other purposes, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. WAGNER. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, agree to the conference asked by the House, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New York.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. FLETCHER, Mr. WAGNER, and Mr. NORBECK conferees on the part of the Senate.

MUSCLE SHOALS

The Senate resumed consideration of the bill (S. 1272) to improve the navigability and to provide for the flood control of the Tennessee River, to provide for reforestation and the proper use of marginal lands in the Tennessee Valley; to provide for the agricultural and industrial development of said valley; to provide for the national defense by the creation of a corporation for the operation of Government properties at and near Muscle Shoals, in the State of Alabama; and for other purposes.

Mr. NORRIS. I send to the desk an amendment to the pending bill, which I ask may be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment submitted by the Senator from Nebraska will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 8, after line 17, it is proposed to insert the following:

(m) The President is authorized, within 4 months after the passage of this act, to lease to the American Farm Bureau Federation, or to any corporation organized by said corporation, nitrate plant no. 2 and Waco Quarry, together with the railroad connecting said quarry with nitrate plant no. 2, for a term not exceeding 50 years, at a rental of not less than $1 per year; but such authority shall be subject to the express condition that the lessee shall use said property during the term of said lease exclusively for the manufacture of fertilizer and fertilizer ingredients to be used only in the manufacture of fertilizer by said lessee and sold for use as fertilizer. The said lessee shall covenant to keep said property in first-class condition, but the lessee shall be authorized to modernize said plant no. 2 by the installation of such machinery as may be necessary, and is authorized to amortize the cost of said machinery and improvements over the term of said lease or any part thereof. Said lease shall provide that during the second and third years of the same said nitrate plant no. 2 shall be operated to at least 25 percent of its capacity, and that during the remainder of said lease the same shall be operated at least to 50 percent of its capacity; and said lease shall also provide that during any year of the period covered by said lease, if the lessee operates said plant to 75 percent of its capacity, then the rental for such year shall be remitted. Said lease shall also provide that the board shall sell to the lessee power for the operation of said plant at the same price that it charges all other customers for power of the same class and quantity. Said lease shall also provide that if the said lessee does not desire to buy power of the publicly owned plant, it shall have the right to purchase its power for the operation of said plant of the Alabama Power Co. or any other privately owned corporation engaged in the generation and sale of electric power, and in such case the lease shall provide further that the said lessee shall have a free right of way to build a transmission line over Government property to said plant. Said lease shall also provide that the said lessee shall covenant that during the term of said lease the said lessee shall not enter into any illegal monopoly, combination, or trust with any privately owned corporation engaged in the manufacture, production, and sale of fertilizer with the object or effect of increasing the price of fertilizer to the farmer.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I am offering this amendment, as I said in the debate on the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], for the purpose of leasing nitrate plant no. 2. To be of any value, nitrate plant no. 2 must have with it Waco Quarry, the limestone quarry, and that is included in the authorization. It also must have the railroad which is owned by the Government connecting Waco Quarry with nitrate plant no. 2.

Mr. President, as I said today in the debate on the amendment we have just voted on, and to some extent on yesterday, the propaganda that has been going over the country for 10 years has been fathered more by the American Farm Bureau Federation than any other organization, although it always seemed to me that there was a good deal of doubt as to whether that organization was really paying the expenses of what was, in a great many instances, a very expensive propaganda based on two things: First, that nitrate plant no. 2 at Muscle Shoals could produce nitrogen cheaper than any other plant on earth could produce it; and, second, that in order to get effective results from it, it must be operated by a private corporation, and that the dead hand of the Government must be removed; that there must not be any semblance of public ownership anywhere.

The recommendation made by the commission appointed by Mr. Hoover, after he had vetoed the Muscle Shoals bill that went to him during the last Congress, was that Muscle Shoals be leased, preferably to a farmer-owned corporation.

Mr. President, if these people are right, then here is their opportunity to make good on the boasting in which they have been indulging for 12 years. No one will be more delighted than I to have it prove a great success. I am, therefore, asking the Senate to add this amendment to the bill and to give the President the authority to make such a lease.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. Under this amendment could the Farm Bureau Federation, if the property should be leased to them, use it for any other purpose except for the manufacture of nitrates?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; they could manufacture fertilizer and ingredients of fertilizer to be used as fertilizer, but they could not go outside that.

Mr. McKELLAR. They could not go outside of fertilizer?

Mr. NORRIS. No. Mr. President, I do not have anything further to say.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote!

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BACHMAN. Mr. President, I am in receipt of a telegram in connection with this bill, which I desire to have incorporated in the RECORD. I ask unanimous consent that that may be done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The telegram is as follows:

CHATTANOOGA, TENN., May 2, 1933.

Senator NATHAN L. BACHMAN,

Senate Office Building:

With reference to Government's proposed building of Cove Creek-Muscle Shoals transmission line at estimated cost of $6,000,000, please advise Senate that at hearing before Military Affairs Committee of House, April 14, Mr. Willkie, speaking for this company, stated that if the Government will furnish us the power at Muscle Shoals, we will deliver an equal amount at Cove Creek at reasonable cost to be fixed by the Government, or this company will sell Government all its requirements of power at Cove Creek for construction work. Based upon Government's estimates of power requirements, in our judgment, the total cost of power for entire construction of Cove Creek Dam furnished under either proposal will be less than 1 year's interest on cost of construction of proposed transmission line, and that building of transmission line in any event wholly useless and wasteful, as entire territory more than adequately served with existing transmission lines.

THE TENNESSEE ELECTRIC POWER CO.,

By JAMES A. LONGLEY, Vice President.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I will delay a vote on this bill only long enough to state very briefly why I cannot support it; and, if the debate shall then be over, we will be able to have a vote on the passage of the bill.

The question of Muscle Shoals is one that has been before the Senate and House for many years. The first speech that I heard made by the late distinguished and beloved Oscar Underwood, of Alabama, was in the House of Representatives, back in 1913, when he called the attention of the country to the valuable potential power possibilities at Muscle Shoals. When I made inquiry I was told by a colleague of mine, later the Speaker of the House of Representatives, Mr. Longworth, that Muscle Shoals was a hoary-headed subject and had been discussed in Congress for many years.

At that time Mr. Underwood asked for an appropriation of only $10,000,000 for the development of the property. It is an old story that, the project having been defeated over and over again, it was finally brought up under the stress of the World War, when provision was made for the erection of a nitrate plant, the initial authorized appropriation for which was $20,000,000. Later the appropriation was increased, and still later further additions were made to the appropriations, until now I do not know just how much the Government has already invested, if not sunk, in Muscle Shoals; but I do know that the initial cost of the Wilson Dam was $47,000,000, of the steam plant $12,000,000 more, and the nitrate plant and the development of facilities for procuring raw material, such as quarries, and so forth, involved an expenditure of $68,000,000 more, not including $9,000,000 in additions to the electrical plant. It is now proposed in the pending bill to construct Cove Creek Dam and to install an electric transmission line, the cost of which is generally estimated at about $41,000,000. We have, Mr. President, an investment of at least $127,000,000 already made; and it is now estimated by various authorities, including the Army engineers, that it will require an expenditure of at least $100,000,000 more new money before the whole project shall be completed.

The argument is that, having invested so much, we must invest the remainder in order not to lose it all. I recognize the force of that argument; but it is the old story; when an undertaking is once entered upon, although it is of doubtful wisdom, it cannot be stopped. Nobody can tell just how far this charge on the Treasury will go. There are some limitations provided, but nobody can be certain. I need not go farther than to state that the authorization of the appropriation is indeterminate and without limit, except to carry out the proposals of the bill, which of themselves are quite indefinite. The language of the authorization is broad as language can make it:

All appropriations necessary to carry out the provisions of this act are hereby authorized.

The operating costs of the proposal will reach at least $9,000,000 per annum, including interest on the investment already made, to say nothing of what is proposed to spend in addition.

When we go over the details of the bill and see what is to be the charge upon the Treasury, we find that it is all indeterminate and that no living person can tell what will be the cost of the project to the Federal Government.

I want to do something with Muscle Shoals. I have been in favor of it from the beginning. I felt that if we ventured upon it we ought to make final and definite decision about it. There have been proposals that we should junk the whole thing, that the entire investment would be better lost than to go on and suffer losses which may result in an endeavor to develop it. I do not share that idea at all. I do not think there is any basis for it.

Another proposal was made to sell Muscle Shoals. Up to date we have found no buyer except Henry Ford, whose proposal was not satisfactory. The only thing left is for the Government to operate it as a Government project with all the eventualities that may flow from it, or else to lease it. I have always been in favor of the leasing plan. I followed former Senator Oscar Underwood in his efforts in this body to have that accomplished, but we failed. I would, of course, want to lease it under limitations so that the Government could at a definite time recapture it. But up to date we have not succeeded in leasing it. I would now very gladly vote in this very hour to turn it over to the States of Alabama and Tennessee to be used by those States for the benefit of the localities there and the people who live there, of course exempting the Federal Government from further expenditure in the matter, but turning over this "Jonah" to the people who are clamoring for it under Government management and letting them develop it as best they can, assuming all the risks. I think there is some sentiment in this body and the body at the other end of the Capitol for such a proposal, but not sufficient, it seems, to be effective.

Mr. President, I am opposed to the Government going into the power business as it is here proposed. I have voted, of course, under certain conditions for the Government to do a certain amount of development in the matter of power. I did it in connection with the Boulder Canyon project. Primarily I voted for the Boulder Canyon project on the basis of flood control, with a by-product in the nature of irrigation and the development of power, a power that could be leased by the Government, and I think probably that should be done. I would do that same thing in the case of Muscle Shoals.

Now comes the suggestion of flood control in connection with the new dam to be built. I would be willing to vote for an item of flood control which would include not more than about $5,000,000 out of the $41,000,000, but we here are using flood control as a basis upon which to bring the Federal Government into the further development of this great project.

Mr. President, I stated yesterday that I think we are operating on the wrong angle with reference to the emergency situation with which we are dealing. It is true that the Muscle Shoals project will employ a lot of labor, but in contrast with the normal employment in the normal processes of private business, this project as unemployment remedy becomes pitiable. There will not be a very large amount of labor employed. In the second place, if it is not reproductive, it will be a useless waste, which I am fearful is going to be the result.

We cannot hope to come out of the depression in which we must employ unemployed labor unless we make it possible for business in a normal way of productive industry to enter into the employment of labor. Here we are further embarrassing the channels of the employment of labor, which must be through private enterprise, by putting into competition with private employment an unfair competitor, the Government, with the power of monopoly that easily could drive out of existence its rival in the form of private enterprise. In the degree that we take away from the current of private investment in the employment of labor, by Government operation of what should be carried on by private enterprise, just to that degree we not only reduce income to the Government in the form of taxes but we increase the charge on the Treasury and thus enlarge upon the deficit and increase the tax burden.

Mr. President, if we go over the authorizations for expenditures from the Treasury that we have made recently, especially in the last 2 months when we have been making an effort to balance the Budget, it simply bewilders us. It leaves us dizzy. We are constantly making new demands on the Treasury. Here in this bill is an indefinite one. No one knows how large it will be. In our recent legislation it will be $500,000,000, in one bill another time it will be $3,000,000,000, another time it is this authorization and then that authorization, until we have increased the public debt to such an extent that even the interest charge upon the increased public debt is going to be staggering.

We are doing it on the theory of those now in charge of affairs that the proper thing to do is to spend. That is the slogan now. It is no longer our business to save. Our business now is to spend, and we are told from the very highest authority that it is the business of the Government to spend, and thus start in circulation the money in the country. Under that aegis we have woefully enlarged the demands upon the Federal Treasury at the very moment that the most commanding demand upon us is to reduce expenditures so that we can be assured that the taxing burden is not going to prevent resumption of business. Let me assure my colleagues that there will be no resumption of business so long as that sword is held over the head of business. Every day we are making new demands that are further embarrassing the Treasury, and in turn the employment of labor, and we do it in the hope that through this spending orgy we are going to spend ourselves out of the depression.

Mr. President, I have issued this warning over and over again that there is no hope of getting out of the depression except by making it possible for business to resume and employ the unemployed. Every move we have made in recent days, instead of giving opportunity to business to take this course, we have been throwing more obstacles in the way, making demands for greater taxes which must come from business and at the same time reducing the ability of business to pay revenue. The deficit now facing us for 1934 will reach $812,000,000. We cannot get on in that way. There will be a day of reckoning, and it will not be long deferred if we continue this program.

Of course, this bill is only one item, and it is not the most offensive item in the program. I admit that. However, there is an indeterminate amount of money demanded. While we ought to dispose of Muscle Shoals, now that we were induced to enter upon the project, it would be very much better for us not to undertake the expensive task to operate it as a Government proposition. We ought to lease it either to groups that will be able to operate it on terms satisfactory to the Government or else to turn it over to the States of Alabama and Tennessee.

For these reasons I shall vote against the proposal, as I do not want to commit myself to the policy of the Government of the United States further impinging upon the sources of revenue which must come from private enterprise.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I do not wonder that my good friend from Ohio [Mr. Fess] and others sometimes fall into the error into which the Senator clearly has fallen at this time. I understand the Senator from Ohio is in favor of the St. Lawrence waterway treaty, which would take $600,000,000 or possibly more of the people's money and spend it to build a waterway for Canada. With that kind of an idea in mind, I do not see how the Senator or anyone else hesitate to vote to give a little something to the United States. But here my friend from Ohio and I are both living in the Mississippi Valley, and naturally I felt if there was any money outside of the Budget or within the Budget that was going to be spent it should be spent to develop the Mississippi Valley, the Ohio River, and the Mississippi River; but it seems that my friend from Ohio is in favor of taking all of our money and spending it for the benefit of Canada and not doing anything for our fellow citizens here in the United States.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. LONG. Certainly.

Mr. FESS. The St. Lawrence waterway to which the Senator from Louisiana has referred will in time be a reproductive agency through which we will get returns, and it will certainly be a great outlet for the farmer who will ship his products from the port of entry and they will not be unloaded until they reach their destination in a foreign country. To me that is rather a convincing argument, although I am not at all overly enthusiastic about the St. Lawrence waterway.

Mr. LONG. Well, Mr. President, we are sinking our money in various projects, and a lot of it is going to be spent on the sapling program, contrary to what we thought was going to be done. I refer to the "sapling program," though I doubt very much whether there will ever be a sapling. I never expect to see a tree come from the program. I understand now there is a little effort being made to slow up the rivers and harbors program and the development of flood control and navigation and taking even that money and putting it into the tree-planting business. We see a picture of 8 or 10 men in a little square of ground about 6 feet wide planting saplings. If they were doing any work, they would have one man planting half an acre in a day. The money is to be taken away from flood control and from navigation and from rivers and harbors and from inland waterways generally and used in this kind of a way. We are going to suspend the work that we have had every right to expect to be carried on; and then, after they have left us subject to the waters of the North and from 32 or 34 States, and we look around, lo and behold, when they are telling us that we will have to stand the floods which are washing away our houses and washing away our homes and drowning our people and destroying our lands and taking everything from one end of the country to the other, they say they have not any money for that purpose, that the Budget is not balanced, and our friend from Illinois wants the Budget balanced; and lo and behold, we hear him say they are going to take $600,000,000 to build a port for Montreal.

I never knew that there was such brotherly love in the Senate and in Congress; but we have to go across the international boundary line to find somebody upon whom to spend the brotherly love. We cannot talk about balancing the Budget except when it comes to the expenses of the American people. If it is food for the American people that is involved, we have to bear in mind the necessity of balancing the Budget. If it is clothes for the American people that are concerned, we have to bear in mind the necessity first of balancing the Budget. If it is a question of jobs for the soldiers who have gone to fight our wars, we must remember that it is necessary to balance the Budget; but if it is money for Canada, to build a port for Montreal, with $600,000,000 to be spent, we are not worrying about balancing the Budget. So why hesitate on a thing of this kind? [Laughter.]

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I desire to offer the amendment relative to transmission lines which was submitted a few days ago. I have made certain modifications in the amendment since it was printed. I send the modified amendment to the desk and ask to have it stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The modified amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 11, beginning with line 14, it is proposed to strike out all of sections 10, 11, and 12 and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

Sec. 10. The board is hereby empowered and authorized to sell the surplus power not used in its operations and for operation of locks and other works to States, counties, municipalities, corporations, partnerships, or individuals, according to the policies hereinafter set forth, and to carry out said authority the board is authorized to enter into contracts for such sale for a term not exceeding 20 years and in the sale of such current by the Board it shall give preference to States, counties, municipalities, or cooperative organizations of citizens or farmers, not organized or doing business for profit, but primarily for the purpose of supplying electricity to their own citizens or members: Provided, That all contracts made with private companies or individuals for the sale of power, which power is to be resold for a profit, shall contain a provision authorizing the board to cancel said contract upon 5 years' notice in writing, if the board needs said power to supply the demands of States, counties, or municipalities.

Sec. 11. It is hereby declared to be the policy of the Government, so far as practical, to transmit or sell all the surplus power generated by the authority at Muscle Shoals equitably among the States, counties, and municipalities within transmission distance.

Sec. 12. In event the Board is unable to make satisfactory contracts with persons, firms, or corporations engaged in the distribution and resale of electricity as in this act provided, or for the use or purchase of such transmission lines, it is hereby expressly authorized, either from appropriations made by Congress or from funds secured from the sale of such power or from proceeds from the sale of bonds as herein authorized, with the approval of the President, to construct, lease, or authorize the construction of transmission lines within transmission distance not to exceed 400 miles from the place where the power is generated, if, after investigation, the board shall find that such transmission lines are economically justified and necessary to carry out the purposes of this act. The finding of the board shall be conclusive and shall not be reviewed by any court: Provided, That the project herein provided for shall be considered primarily as for the benefit of the people of the section as a whole, and particularly the domestic and rural consumers, to whom the power can economically be made available, and accordingly that sale to and use by industry shall be a secondary purpose, to be utilized principally to secure a sufficiently high load factor and revenue returns which will permit domestic and rural use at the lowest possible rates and in such manner as to encourage increased domestic and rural use of electricity: Provided, That if any State, county, municipality, or other public or cooperative organization of citizens or farmers, not organized or doing business for profit, but primarily for the purpose of supplying electricity to its own citizens or members, or any two or more of such municipalities or organizations, shall construct or agree to construct a transmission line to the place of generation, or to the Government reservation on which is located a power-generating plant operated by the Authority, or to some place along or at the end of a transmission line, the board is hereby authorized to contract with such State, county, municipality, or other organization, or two or more of them, for the sale of electricity for a term not exceeding 30 years, and in any such case the board shall give to such State, county, municipality, or other organization ample time to fully comply with any local law now in existence or hereafter enacted providing for the necessary legal authority for such State, county, municipality, or other organization to contract with the board for such power: Provided further, That all contracts entered into between the authority and any municipality or other political subdivision or cooperative association shall provide that the electric power shall be sold and distributed to the ultimate consumer without discrimination as between consumers of the same class, and such contract shall be voidable at the election of the authority if a discriminatory rate, rebate, or other special concession is made or given to any consumer or user by the municipality or other political subdivision: And provided further, That as to any surplus power not so sold as above provided to States, counties, municipalities, or other said organizations, before the Authority shall sell the same to any person or corporation engaged in the distribution and resale of electricity for profit, it shall require said person or corporation to agree that any resale of such electric power by said person or corporation shall be sold to the ultimate consumer of such electric power at a price that shall not exceed an amount found to be reasonable, just, and fair by the Federal Power Commission, or its successor as a Federal regulatory body having similar jurisdiction; and in case of any such sale if an amount is charged the ultimate consumer which is in excess of the price so deemed to be just, reasonable, and fair by the Federal Power Commission, or its successor as aforesaid, the contract for such sale between the board and such distributor of electricity shall by the authority be voidable at the election of the authority.

On page 17, beginning with line 23, it is proposed to strike out section 18, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

Sec. 18. The Secretary of War is hereby authorized, with appropriations hereafter to be made available by the Congress or from funds arising from the sale of bonds, to construct, either directly or by contract to the lowest responsible bidder or bidders, after due advertisement, a dam which has by long usage become known and designated as the Cove Creek Dam in and across the Clinch River in the State of Tennessee, together with a transmission line to Muscle Shoals interconnecting with any intermediate power plants: Provided, That such transmission line may be constructed only if the board is unable to make contracts satisfactory to the Authority with owners of privately owned lines for the transmission of power, or for the use or the purchase of transmission lines, and if, after investigation, the Board shall find that such transmission line is economically justified and necessary to carry out the purposes of this act. The findings of the board shall be conclusive and shall not be reviewed by any court. Such construction shall be according to the latest and most approved designs of the Chief of Engineers, including power house and hydroelectric installations and equipment for the generation of electric power in order that the waters of the said Clinch River may be impounded and stored above said dam for the purpose of promoting navigation by increasing and regulating the flow of the Clinch River and the Tennessee River below, so that the maximum amount of primary power may be developed at Dam No. 2 and at any other dams below the said Cove Creek Dam.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, the amendment as originally offered is a copy of the House bill on the subject. The difference between the two bills, in short, is that the pending bill, the Norris bill, authorizes the board, without consideration of any other subject, to build transmission lines, giving them absolute power to do so. The House bill, which is covered by this amendment, requires that before building such transmission lines the board shall endeavor to make contracts with existing utility companies to bring about satisfactory transmission of the power, and to procure the same contemplated benefits for the consumers.

Mr. President, while there is really no broad difference between the two plans, it seems to me that the provisions of the House bill are more in line with similar transactions that would be undertaken by individuals, and more consistent with orderly business procedure, and fairer to those now engaged in the same service. So far as I am concerned, I am unwilling to incorporate in the bill, and would not vote for, any amendment which deprives the board of the absolute power to make that decision. For that reason I have offered the amendment incorporating the provision of the House bill to meet the suggestion made by the Senator from Nebraska that if left in its original form the provision might result in litigation and delay.

While I did not agree with the Senator's conclusion that an injunction could be based upon the language of the original bill, because it seemed to me rather clear that an effort to make contracts and to decide that the project is economically feasible is purely an administrative duty, still, in order to avoid any possibility of delay on account of an effort by anyone to review the action of the board, I have offered the suggested amendment that the decision of the board shall be final and not subject to review by any court.

If even stronger language is desired, it will be entirely acceptable to me, because I am as anxious as the Senator from Nebraska that there should be no improper delay in this program. It comes down, then, as I see it, to a declaration of policy by Congress on the subject, not only to deal with the procedure during the immediate months ahead of us, but a declaration at least to guide the board that may hereafter be entrusted with the administration of this law.

It seems to me that the provision is a thoroughly sound one; and I understand it is really contemplated that the board will first undertake this very program, to make contracts, if possible, for the transmission of power without destroying by direct competition present investments and without the necessity of building competing lines, thereby involving a double burden of earnings upon invested capital.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do.

Mr. BONE. As I read section 12 of the Norris bill, it would seem clearly to cover the matter about which the Senator speaks.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I think there is very little difference in principle between the two bills.

Mr. BONE. Section 12 provides:

In order to place the board upon a fair basis for making such contracts and for receiving bids for the sale of such power, it is hereby expressly authorized, either from appropriations made by Congress or from funds secured from the sale of such power or from funds secured by the sale of bonds hereafter provided for, to construct, lease, or authorize the construction of transmission lines within transmission distance from the place where generated.

The language seems extremely broad. It probably is as broad as it is possible to make it; and I am wondering wherein the Senator finds the language insufficient to cover what he is discussing.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do not find it insufficient; and I say that in principle, and really in operation by the board, there is very little difference, except that the House provision provides, as included in the amendment I have offered here, that the board shall undertake to make such contracts before they are authorized to build transmission lines.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. COPELAND. Is not this the difference: In the Norris bill provision is made really for holding a club over these private concerns, while in the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama, before the board engages in building transmission lines, there is a definite declaration that first there shall be negotiations for private lines, to see whether or not they can be purchased.

It is that particular feature that commends the Senator's amendment to me. It is made clear under the law that there shall first be an opportunity for the private investors who have invested millions of money in transmission lines to dispose of their holdings. Then, as the Senator has well said, if there is a failure of these negotiations, under the Bankhead amendment the board is authorized to proceed to do the things which are more directly set out by the Norris proposal.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is correct, sir. It simply requires an effort to be made to acquire the existing lines before building others. The language of the amendment, to which I call the Senator's attention is that "in event the board is unable to make satisfactory contracts", it is authorized to build whatever lines it deems necessary.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, is not the matter the Senator suggests a mere distinction without a difference?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I will say to the Senator that it is in one sense; but in another and an important sense it is not entirely the same, because it clearly defines what I understand to be everybody's purpose and spirit about this program. It defines the policy on that subject for the guidance and instruction of the board, who have absolute power in the matter; the policy defined being that it is not intended, unless it is necessary, to proceed with the investment of additional capital and the construction of competing lines if the same results can be otherwise obtained.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield.

Mr. BONE. I am sure the Senator realizes that when the Government goes into that section and builds a plant for the purpose of producing, transmitting, and selling power it is not going to meet with an enthusiastic welcome at the hands of the private power interests located there. I feel that the Senator will agree with me as to that.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I think there will not be any great enthusiasm about it; but I really believe that rather than have competing lines built they would enter into contracts.

Mr. BONE. Having in mind the fact that these power companies—the Alabama Power Co. and the Tennessee Electric Power Co.—are not going to enthusiastically welcome this public-ownership competitor, does the Senator feel that we ought to take from the hands of the proposed power authority the power to build a transmission line or acquire the use of the other at some reasonable rate?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I am not advocating any such plan. The Senator has just stated he could see no objection.

Mr. BONE. That is what I am just suggesting to the Senator; there is nothing in the Norris bill as it is drawn, with the amendment suggested by the Senator from Nebraska, which deprives the power authority of the right to either purchase or lease. Every single avenue for negotiation is open; and I am sure the Senator would not assume that the power authority under this measure would deliberately go in and build a transmission line when they might make some economical arrangement to transmit over a private company's line. That would be a piece of folly I am sure they would not be guilty of.

Mr. BANKHEAD. What is the objection to the amendment, then?

Mr. BONE. The objection is that I think that the matter is fully covered, and, further, because I would not in the remotest degree take from the hands of the power authority full power to do just exactly what the Senator from New York suggested—to use compulsion if it were necessary to secure a square deal.

I asked the Senator whether he thought it was necessary that the power authority be given the fullest power, because we know the private companies will certainly be stubborn. I would not want to strike from the power authority this right to deal at arm's length.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I am sure it is clear that no power is sought to be stricken from the power authority or the board. It is simply a declaration that contracts would be made, if they could be made, before proceeding to the building of competitive transmission lines. Whether they can be made or not is entirely, of course, with the board. It is a declaration that it is preferable to have them made if the board can make such contracts to their satisfaction. But the amendment which I have offered here absolves the board from any responsibility to anybody in the discharge of the duty and power which this amendment places upon them.

My thought is that this idea is entirely in line with the views which President Roosevelt has entertained on the subject, and while, of course, I am not referring to that in the sense that it binds anybody, I think it is appropriate to point out that this program as outlined in the amendment offered is in strict accord with the expressions heretofore made upon this subject by the President in the development of his views upon the subject of utility companies.

I now want to call attention to the power authority act of the State of New York, which was passed under the President's guidance and approval. I read section 5:

5. To develop, maintain, manage, and operate that part of the project owned or controlled by it in such manner as to give effect to the policy hereby declared (and all plans and acts, and all contracts for the use, sale, transmission, and distribution of the power generated by the project, shall be made in the light of, consistent with, and subject to this policy), namely, that the said project shall be in all respects for the aid, improvement, and benefit of commerce and navigation in, through, along, and past the St. Lawrence River and the International Rapids section thereof, and that in the development of hydroelectric power therefrom the said project shall be considered primarily as for the benefit of the people of the State as a whole and particularly the domestic and rural consumers to whom the power can economically be made available, and accordingly that sale to and use by industry shall be a secondary purpose, to be utilized principally to secure a sufficiently high load factor and revenue returns which will permit domestic and rural use at the lowest possible rates and in such manner as to encourage increased domestic and rural use of electricity. In furtherance of this policy and to secure a wider distribution of the said power and use of the greatest value to the general public of the State, the power authority shall, in addition to other methods which it may find advantageous, make provision so that municipalities and other political subdivisions of the State now or hereafter authorized by law to engage in the distribution of electrical current may secure a reasonable share of the power generated at the project, and shall sell the same or cause the same to be sold to such municipalities and political subdivisions at prices representing cost of generation, plus capital and operating charges, plus a fair cost of transmission, all as determined by the trustees, and subject to conditions which shall assure the resale of such power to domestic and rural consumers at the lowest possible price. To that end the power authority may provide in any contract or contracts which it may make for the sale, transmission, and distribution of the said power that the purchaser, transmitter, or distributor shall construct, maintain, and operate, on such terms as the power authority may deem proper, such connecting lines as may be necessary for transmission of the power from main transmission lines to such municipalities or political subdivisions.

6. To negotiate in the manner hereinafter provided a contract or contracts for the sale, transmission, and distribution of the power generated under the project, which by the terms thereof will provide—

It sets out the provisions. Now I want to read briefly another section:

10. In the event that the power authority shall be unable to agree upon the terms of a contract or contracts in accordance with the provisions of subparagraph 6 of section 5 above, it shall report to the governor and legislature the circumstances and the reasons for such inability to agree. It shall also report a plan or plans for the disposal of the power through some other method or methods, which in its judgment will effectuate the policy and purposes of this act, including the building of transmission lines, steam plants, and/or distributing systems by it, if it finds the same practicable, together with estimates of the cost of such additional facilities and the revenues to be derived therefrom. In the event of such inability to agree upon the terms of a contract or contracts as herein provided, or upon the governor's disapproval of the proposed contracts, none of the powers herein granted by section 5, subparagraph 7, to own, build, operate, and maintain dams, power houses, and other instrumentalities and things incidental to or connected with the development and sale of hydroelectric power shall be exercised until the legislature and the governor shall have approved the plan or plans reported by the power authority.

It will be observed that the amendment, like the House plan, follows very closely the power authority act of New York, but in fact goes a step farther. It does not require, as does the New York law, which was the child of President Roosevelt, that there shall be a report back to the legislature and to the governor for authority, as the New York law provides. The advanced step is taken in the House, following out the general lines of this plan, simply of requiring that efforts should be made to contract for the transmission of the power before building transmission lines, and that it should be found that the lines are practicable. Then, as provided in the New York act, if those things are not found by the power authority, they go back to the legislature for new power.

Mr. President, that is not required here, and I am glad it is not required. It is simply left to the board to make its efforts to find contracts and make contracts if it can do so for the transmission of the power on terms equally beneficial to the public and to the consumers. Failing in that, then the board, without coming back to Congress, is authorized to proceed with the construction of such transmission lines as it finds are economically feasible, and of course no one wants a line built that is not economically feasible. The decision of that question is left with the board, and it is provided in the amendment I have submitted that that decision is not subject to review by any court. It is simply a rule, I submit, for the guidance of the board which is to operate this great project over a long period of years.

Mr. President, I now want to read from the address of the President while he was Governor of New York to the governors' conference at French Lick. After discussing some of the court decisions on the subject and discussing the New York act, he said:

In other words, the new commission for the actual process of development has been appointed. We hope this new commission will be able, in order to prevent duplication of existing lines, to make a fair contract with existing utility companies, under which contract the utility companies will receive the actual cost of transmission, the actual cost of distribution, plus a reasonable profit on that transmission and distribution.

Now, if such a contract cannot be made, the State is not going to be left with 1,250,000 horsepower on its hands. We propose to take the next step. The next step will be to make an effort to find some other private agency which will be willing to transmit throughout the upper part of the State and to distribute to the people of that part of the State on the terms and principles laid down in the law itself. Failing in that, there is but one alternative, obviously, and that is for the State itself to undertake transmission and/or distribution.

On the question of where this power is going, it is expressly stated in the law that the primary use of the power shall not be for the large manufacturing companies which take bulk power, but must use the principle of distributing it to the homes, the farms, and the smaller businesses throughout the State. This can be done at rates certainly far more reasonable, far lower than are being paid by these individual householders at the present time, in part through the profit which will be made on the distribution of a certain proportion of that power to the larger manufacturing interests.

Also, we are taking one further step which has been taken by public service commissions in several States, and that is the principle of not penalizing a man because he happens to live a fairly long distance from a main transmission line.

I welcome most thoroughly that principle, because I represent all the people of my State, and I want those in the southern end to have the benefits, as well as those in the northern end. I read further:

The best example of that I know of is down in Alabama.

This is largely what attracted my attention to this statement:

The best example of that I know is down in Alabama. The Alabama Public Service Commission realized some 2 years ago, I think it was, that in northern Alabama they have all the power in the world at very cheap cost. They have plenty of coal and have plenty of water power, and the actual cost of transmitting and distributing that power to the rural dwellers in northern Alabama would be extremely low. On the other hand, in southern Alabama, down on the Gulf (I think a distance of something like 400 miles—Isn't that right, Dr. Hardman?)—there is no coal and there is no water power.

Therefore, the Alabama Public Service Commission laid down the rule that just because a man happened to have been born and brought up on a farm in southern Alabama was no reason for penalizing him greatly over his cousin or neighbor who happened to have been brought up in the northern part of the State, 400 miles away. The result is that the rates laid down for rural electrification in the State of Alabama provide substantially the same rate in the southern part of the State as in the northern part of the State. That is saying, in effect, that the farmer in northern Alabama is paying, frankly, a part of the cost of transmitting power 400 miles away for his fellow citizens of the same State. I believe that principle is being fairly well recognized today not only among Government agencies but also among the more intelligent and more progressive of the utility people.

I find in President Roosevelt's recent book entitled "Looking Forward" this declaration upon the subject now under consideration:

State-owned or Federal-owned power sites can and should promptly be developed by Government itself. When so developed, private capital should be given the first opportunity to transmit and distribute the power on the basis of the best service and the lowest rates to give a reasonable profit only.

That is the last declaration on this subject of which I know.

Mr. President, I ask permission to have published at the conclusion of my remarks the Power Authority Act of New York, from which I have quoted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit A.)

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I do not at present care to take any more of the time of the Senate. I believe that the House provision really expresses the attitude of everybody connected with this legislation and that the only controversy is whether that declaration of policy which we all, I think, believe to be the correct policy to pursue should be written into the law or left merely to the unbridled, undirected discretion of the board. We put no limitations on their power by this amendment. We simply lay down a policy which is in line with the declaration of the President, which is consistent with orderly procedure, as I have said, and which will not in any way hinder, delay, or prevent the beneficial results which we all anticipate under this bill when it shall have been enacted into law.

EXHIBIT A CHAPTER 772

To declare the policy of the State of New York in respect to the use of the St. Lawrence River for the improvement and furtherance of commerce and navigation and the protection and development of the water-power resources thereof, and providing for the creation of "The Power Authority of the State of New York", to effectuate the same, and making an appropriation for the purposes of the act

(Effective Apr. 27, 1931)

The people of the State of New York, represented in senate and assembly, do enact as follows:

SECTION 1. That part of the St. Lawrence River within the boundaries of the State of New York is hereby declared to be a natural resource of the State for the use and development of commerce and navigation in the interest of the people of this State and of the United States, and for the creation and development of hydroelectric power in the interests of the people of this State, and such natural resources, including the bed and waters of the river as instrumentalities of commerce and navigation, and the bed, waters, power, and power sites in, upon, or adjacent to or within the watershed of the said river, owned or controlled by the people of the State, or which may hereafter be recovered by or come within their ownership, possession, and control, shall always remain inalienable to, and ownership, possession, and control thereof shall always be vested in, the people of the State.

SEC. 2. For the purpose of effectuating the policy declared in section 1 and of improving the St. Lawrence River as an instrumentality of commerce and navigation and developing the hydroelectric-power resources thereof, there is hereby created a corporate municipal instrumentality of the State to be known as "The Power Authority of the State of New York", hereinafter referred to as the "power authority", which shall be a body corporate and politic, a political subdivision of the State, exercising governmental and public powers, perpetual in duration, capable of suing and being sued, and having a seal, and which shall have the powers and duties hereinafter enumerated, together with such others as may hereafter be conferred upon it by law.

SEC. 3. Such power authority shall consist of five trustees, who shall serve, respectively, for terms of 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5 years, to be appointed by the Governor, by and with the advice and consent of the senate. Each trustee shall hold office until his successor has been appointed and qualified. At the expiration of the term of each trustee and of each succeeding trustee the Governor shall, by and with the advice and consent of the senate, appoint a successor, who shall hold office for a term of 5 years, or until his successor has been appointed and qualified. In the event of a vacancy occurring in the office of a trustee by death, resignation, or otherwise, the Governor shall, by and with the advice and consent of the senate, appoint his successor, who shall hold office for the unexpired term. Three trustees shall constitute a quorum for the purpose of organizing the power authority and conducting the business thereof.

SEC. 4. The trustees shall choose from among their own number a chairman and vice chairman. They shall take over such part of the staff of the St. Lawrence Power Development Commission, organized under chapter 207 of the laws of 1930, as they deem necessary and convenient, and from time to time shall select such employees, including engineering, marketing, and legal skill, as they may require for the performance of their duties and shall prescribe the duties and compensation of each officer and employee. They shall adopt bylaws and rules and regulations suitable to the purposes of the act. As long as and to the extent that the power authority is dependent upon appropriations for the payment of its expenses, it shall incur no obligations for salary, office, or other expenses prior to the making of appropriations adequate to meet the same. It shall report annually to the Governor and the legislature upon its operations and transactions.

SEC. 5. Forthwith upon the appointment and organization of the trustees and subject to the conditions and limitations in this act contained, the power authority, in cooperation with the proper Canadian authorities and those of the United States as hereinafter directed, shall proceed with the improvement and development of the international rapids section of the St. Lawrence River (which is defined as that part of the said river from Ogdensburg to the point where it leaves the territory of this State) for the aid and benefit of commerce and navigation and for the development of the hydroelectric power inherent therein, generally in accordance with the report and plan submitted under date of January 15, 1931, by the majority of the St. Lawrence Power Development Commission, appointed under chapter 207 of the laws of 1930, and in accordance with the provisions of this act.

The power authority is authorized and directed:

1. To cooperate with the appropriate agencies and officials of the United States Government to the end that any project undertaken under the authority of this act shall be consistent with and in aid of the plans of the United States for the improvement of commerce and navigation along the St. Lawrence River, and shall be so planned and constructed as to be adaptable to the plans of the United States therefor, so that the necessary channels, locks, canals, and other navigational facilities may be constructed and installed by the United States in, through, and as part of the said project.

2. To negotiate with the appropriate Canadian authorities and agencies respecting the improvement and development of the International Rapids section of the St. Lawrence River for the aid and benefit of commerce and navigation and the development of hydroelectric power therefrom and to plan and agree with them upon cooperative action to that end including any shifting of international boundary lines between Canada and the United States and upon the use, control, and disposition of the facilities to be created and the hydroelectric power to be developed by the project. Such negotiations and agreements shall be conducted and concluded with due regard to the position of the United States in respect to international agreements, and any such agreements as may be reached with Canadian authorities or agencies may be submitted by the power authority to Congress for its approval, if it be advised that such approval is necessary or desirable.

3. To apply to the appropriate agencies and officials of the United States Government and/or of the Dominion of Canada or its Provinces, including the International Joint Commission, for such licenses, permits, or approval of its plans or projects as it may deem necessary or advisable: Provided, That neither the said power authority nor any trustee, officer, or agent thereof shall have any power to waive or surrender for any purpose whatsoever any right of the State of New York, whether sovereign or proprietary in character, in and to the St. Lawrence River, its waters, power, channel, bed, or uses, or the right of the said State to assert such rights at any future time: And provided further, That if for any reason the power authority shall fail to secure any such license, permit, or approval as it may deem necessary or advisable, or shall decide not to make application therefor, it is authorized to institute suit, or to apply to Congress for legislation, or take such other action in the premises as it may deem necessary or advisable, in the furtherance of the project and for the protection of its rights and those of the State.

4. To study the desirability and means of attracting industry to the State of New York consistent with and in effectuation of the policy declared in subparagraph 5 immediately following.

5. To develop, maintain, manage, and operate that part of the project owned or controlled by it in such manner as to give effect to the policy hereby declared (and all plans and acts, and all contracts for the use, sale, transmission, and distribution of the power generated by the project, shall be made in the light of, consistent with, and subject to this policy), namely, that the said project shall be in all respects for the aid, improvement, and benefit of commerce and navigation in, through, along, and past the St. Lawrence River and the International Rapids section thereof, and that in the development of hydroelectric power therefrom the said project shall be considered primarily as for the benefit of the people of the State as a whole and particularly the domestic and rural consumers to whom the power can economically be made available, and accordingly that sale to and use by industry shall be a secondary purpose, to be utilized principally to secure a sufficiently high load factor and revenue returns which will permit domestic and rural use at the lowest possible rates and in such manner as to encourage increased domestic and rural use of electricity. In furtherance of this policy and to secure a wider distribution of the said power and use of the greatest value to the general public of the State, the power authority shall in addition to other methods which it may find advantageous make provision so that municipalities and other political subdivisions of the State now or hereafter authorized by law to engage in the distribution of electrical current may secure a reasonable share of the power generated at the project, and shall sell the same or cause the same to be sold to such municipalities and political subdivisions at prices representing cost of generation, plus capital and operating charges, plus a fair cost of transmission, all as determined by the trustees, and subject to conditions which shall assure the resale of such power to domestic and rural consumers at the lowest possible price. To that end the power authority may provide in any contract or contracts which it may make for the sale, transmission, and distribution of the said power that the purchaser, transmitter, or distributor shall construct, maintain, and operate, on such terms as the power authority may deem proper, such connecting lines as may be necessary for transmission of the power from main transmission lines to such municipalities or political subdivisions.

6. To negotiate in the manner hereinafter provided a contract or contracts for the sale, transmission, and distribution of the power generated under the project, which by the terms thereof will provide:

(a) Payment of all operating and maintenance expenses of the project.

(b) Interest on and amortization and reserve charges sufficient within 50 years of the date of issuance to retire the bonds of the power authority issued for the project.

(c) Continuous control and operation of the project by the power authority.

(e) Full and complete disclosure to the power authority of all factors of cost in the transmission and distribution of power, so that rates to consumers may be fixed initially in the contract and may be adjusted from time to time on the basis of true-cost data, provided that in fixing such cost of transmission and distribution no account shall be given to any franchise value, going value, or goodwill based upon the existence of the contract and the availability of the power for sale by the transmitting or distributing company or any company associated therewith.

(f) Periodic revisions of the service and rates to consumers on the basis of accurate cost data obtained by such accounting methods and systems as shall be approved by the trustees and in furtherance and effectuation of the policy declared in subparagraph 5 above.

(g) That the rates, services, and practices of the purchasing, transmitting, and/or distributing companies in respect to the power generated by this project shall be governed by the provisions and principles established in the contract and not by regulations of the public-service commission or by general principles of public service law regulating rates, services, and practices.

(h) The rate structures agreed upon in the said contract may provide different rates for different localities, classes of consumers, and amounts of current consumed, and for changes in the rates resulting from variation in operating costs and fixed charges.

(i) For the cancellation and termination of any such contract upon violation of the terms thereof by the purchasing, transmitting, or distributing company or any subsidiary or associate thereof.

(j) For such security for performance as the power authority may deem practicable and advisable, including provisions assuring the continuance of service by the purchasing, transmitting, and/or distributing companies, and/or the use of their facilities for such service and/or the continuance of an outlet and adequate market for the power generated under the project.

(k) Such other terms not inconsistent with the provisions and policy of this act as the power authority may deem advisable.

7. Upon the completion of the necessary contract or contracts as provided for in subparagraph 6 immediately preceding, to proceed with the physical construction of the project authorized by this act, including the erection of the necessary dams, power houses, and other facilities, instrumentalities and things necessary or convenient to that end, and including also the erection of transmission lines designed to conduct electricity to industrial and other users located at or near the site; and thereafter to maintain and operate the said project in accordance with the provisions and policy of this act. The power authority shall follow the plan reported by the majority of the St. Lawrence Power Development Commission above mentioned, but it shall have power to make such changes in the engineering plans as shall be necessary for agreement with the proper Canadian and United States authorities, or as it may itself find desirable upon further study. The power authority is specifically authorized to undertake the construction of the said project in one or more steps as it may find economically desirable or advantageous, and as it may agree with the appropriate Canadian and United States authorities. Whenever in this act reference is made to the "project", it shall be understood to refer to such part of the entire project as may from time to time be in existence or immediately projected.

8. To exercise all the powers necessary or convenient to carry out and effectuate the purposes and provisions of this act and, as incidental thereto, to own, lease, build, operate, maintain, and dispose of real and personal property of every kind and character, to acquire real property and any or every interest therein for its lawful purposes by purchase or by condemnation as herein-after provided, to borrow money and secure the same by bonds or liens upon revenue from any property or contracts held or to be held by it, to sell water or electric power, and generally to do any and every thing necessary or convenient to carry out the purposes of this act, provided that the power authority shall have no power at any time to pledge the credit of the State nor shall any of the obligations or securities be deemed to be obligations of the State nor shall the power authority have the power to lease or sell any dam or power house at the site.

9. Notwithstanding any limitations hereinbefore expressed, the power authority is authorized and directed forthwith or from time to time, as it shall deem advisable and within the limitations of the appropriations made available for it to initiate and prosecute all inquiries, investigations, surveys, and studies which it may deem necessary or desirable as preliminary to the effectuation of the other powers and duties conferred upon it by this act.

Sec. 6. The State of New York hereby consents to the occupation and use by the power authority of any and all property of the State of whatever kind or character within the International Rapids section of the St. Lawrence River and hereby vests the power authority with and delegates to it the right to exercise any and every right and power of the State in connection therewith, whether proprietary or sovereign in character, which the State itself might exercise, provided that such consent and delegation of power shall not permit the impairment or limit or prevent the future improvement of the navigability of the International Rapids section of the said river, consistent with the maintenance of this project, but on the contrary the project shall be such as will improve and benefit commerce and navigation therein and provided further that the power authority shall have no power to limit, waive, or surrender any right or interest of the State of New York in the said river or the use thereof. The State of New York does hereby pledge to and agree with those subscribing to the obligations to be issued by the power authority for the construction of such project, and with those parties who may enter into contracts with the power authority pursuant to the provisions in subparagraph six above, that the State will not limit or alter the rights hereby vested in the power authority until the said obligations together with the interest thereon are fully met and discharged and/or the said contracts are fully performed on the part of the power authority, provided that nothing herein contained shall preclude such limitation or alteration if and when adequate provision shall be made by law for the protection of those advancing money on such obligations of the power authority or those entering into such contracts with the power authority. The power authority as agent for the State is authorized to include this pledge and undertaking for the State in such obligations or contracts.

Sec. 7. It is hereby found and declared that the project authorized by this act is for the aid and improvement of commerce and navigation, and that such aid and improvement of commerce and navigation and the development, sale, and distribution of hydro-electric power is in all respects for the benefit of the people of the State of New York, for the improvement of their health and welfare and material prosperity, and is a public purpose, and the power authority shall be regarded as performing a governmental function in undertaking the said project and in carrying out the provisions of this statute, and shall be required to pay no taxes or assessments upon any of the property acquired by it for this project or upon its activities in the operation and maintenance thereof. The securities and other obligations issued by the power authority, their transfer and the income therefrom, shall at all times be free from taxation within this State. It is furthermore declared that the object and purpose of this statute is that the said project should be in all respects self-supporting.

Sec. 8. No bonds or other obligations of the power authority shall be issued until firm contracts for the sale of power shall have been made by it sufficient to insure payment of all operating and maintenance expenses of the project, and interest on, and amortization and reserve charges sufficient to retire, the bonds of the power authority issued for the project in not more than 50 years from the date of issue thereof.

Sec. 9. Contracts negotiated by the power authority as provided in subparagraph 6 of section 5 of this act shall be entered into and executed as follows:

1. After agreement upon the terms of any such contracts shall have been reached by the power authority and its co-party or co-parties, the power authority shall hold a public hearing or hearings upon the terms thereof. At least 30 days' notice of such hearing shall be given by publication once in each week during such period in each of six newspapers within the State to be selected by the power authority. Copies of the proposed contracts shall be available for public inspection during such period of 30 days at the office or offices of the power authority and at such other places throughout the State as it may designate.

2. Following such public hearing the power authority shall reconsider the terms of the proposed contract or contracts and shall negotiate such changes and modifications in the contract or contracts as it then deems necessary or advisable.

3. When such contract or contracts are finally agreed upon in terms satisfactory to the power authority and its co-party or co-parties, and which the power authority believes to be in the public interest, the power authority shall thereupon report the proposed contract or contracts, together with its recommendations and the record of the public hearings thereon to the Governor of the State, who shall within 60 days thereafter indicate his approval or disapproval thereof and give his reasons therefor. For the purpose of supplementary investigation of such contract by the Governor, $25,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the State treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended by him for such investigation and the retention of such expert assistance thereof as he may desire. The said $25,000 so appropriated shall be paid out of the State treasury on the audit and warrant of the comptroller upon vouchers signed by the Governor.

4. If the Governor shall approve such contract, then the same shall be executed by the chairman and secretary of the power authority, and it shall thereupon come into full force and effect and be binding upon the power authority and all other parties thereto in accordance with its terms.

Sec. 10. In the event that the power authority shall be unable to agree upon the terms of a contract or contracts in accordance with the provisions of subparagraph 6 of section 5, it shall report to the Governor and legislature the circumstances and the reasons for such inability to agree. It shall also report a plan or plans for the disposal of the power through some other method or methods which in its judgment will effectuate the policy and purposes of this act, including the building of transmission lines, steam plants, and/or distributing systems by it, if it finds the same practicable, together with estimates of the cost of such additional facilities and the revenues to be derived therefrom. In the event of such inability to agree upon the terms of a contract or contracts as herein provided, or upon the Governor's disapproval of the proposed contracts, none of the powers herein granted by section 5, subparagraph 7, to own, build, operate, and maintain dams, power houses, and other instrumentalities and things incidental to or connected with the development and sale of hydro-electric power shall be exercised until the legislature and the Governor shall have approved the plan or plans reported by the power authority.

Sec. 11. For the purpose of exercising its powers and performing its duties hereunder and of securing such information as it may deem necessary hereunder, the power authority shall have the power to compel the attendance of witnesses and the production of documents in the manner provided for in the Civil Practice Act for the subpoenaing of witnesses and production of documents before a referee or special master, and if a person subpoenaed to attend before it shall fail to obey the command of such subpoena without reasonable cause, or refuse to be sworn or examined, or to answer a pertinent question or produce a pertinent book or paper, the power authority may apply to the supreme court or any judge thereof for an order requiring such person to show cause why he should not comply with the subpoena or direction of the power authority. The court, or a justice before whom such order shall be returnable shall examine such person, determine whether or not the testimony or evidence is relevant or pertinent, and if it be so determined, shall order such person to comply accordingly forthwith, and in the event of refusal may commit the offender to jail, there to remain until he submits to the order of the court or such justice, or is discharged according to law. The power hereby conferred from the power authority may be exercised by any one or more of the trustees if he or they are authorized so to act on behalf of the power authority by resolution or by law.

Sec. 12. If, for any of the purposes hereunder, including temporary construction purposes and the making of additions or improvements, the power authority shall find it necessary or convenient for it to acquire any real property as herein defined, whether for immediate or future use, then the power authority may find and determine that such property is required for a public use, and upon such due determination, the said property shall be and shall be deemed to be required for such public use until otherwise determined by the power authority and with the exceptions hereinafter specifically noted the said determination of fact shall not be affected by the fact that such property has theretofore been taken for, or is then devoted to, a public use; but the public use in the hands or under the control of the power authority shall be deemed superior to the public use in the hands of any other person, association, or corporation. If the power authority is unable to agree for the acquirement of any such property, or if the owner thereof shall be incapable of disposing of the same, or if, after diligent search and inquiry, the name and residence of any such owner cannot be ascertained, or if any such property has been acquired or attempted to be acquired and title or other rights therein have been found to be invalid or defective, the power authority may acquire such property by condemnation under and pursuant to the provisions of this act.

1. When any real property within this State is sought to be acquired by condemnation, the power authority shall cause a survey and map to be made thereof, and shall cause such survey and map to be filed in its office. There shall be annexed to such survey and map a certificate executed by the chief engineer of the power authority, or by such other officer or employee as may be designated by the trustees, stating that the property or interest therein described in such survey and map are necessary for its purposes.

2. Upon filing such survey and map the power authority shall petition a special term of the supreme court held in the judicial district in which the property is located, or the county court of any county where such property is located, for the condemnation of such property or interest therein, as have not been otherwise acquired. The said petition shall be generally in the form prescribed by section 4 of the condemnation law, so far as consistent herewith. Such petition, together with a notice of pendency of the proceeding, shall be filed in the office of the county clerk of the said county and shall be indexed and recorded as provided by law. A copy of the said petition together with a notice of the presentation thereof to such special term of the supreme court or to the county court shall be served upon the owners as provided in sections 5 and 6 of the condemnation law. The power authority may cause a duplicate original affidavit of the service thereof to be recorded in the books used for recording deeds in the office of the county clerk of the county wherein the said property described in such notice is situated, and the recording of such affidavit shall be prima-facie evidence of due service thereof.

3. At any time after the recording of the petition and notice as above provided the power authority may enter upon and use and occupy all the parcels of real estate described in the proceedings for the condemnation thereof, provided that it shall first deposit with the court a sum equal to the assessed valuation of such real property, or in the event that the assessed valuation thereof cannot readily be ascertained, such sum as in its judgment shall be sufficient as compensation for the real property acquired. The sum so deposited shall be applied as provided in section 24 of the condemnation law. Upon the recording of the petition and notice and the making of the deposit, the owner or person in possession of such real property shall deliver possession thereof to the power authority upon demand, and in case possession is not delivered when demanded, or demand is not convenient because of absence of the owner or inability to locate or determine the owner, the power authority may apply to the court without notice for an order requiring the sheriff to put it into possession of such real property. Such an order must be executed as if it were an execution for the delivery of the possession of the property.

4. The proceedings thereafter shall be in the manner prescribed by the condemnation law so far as consistent herewith.

5. The commissioners appointed to ascertain and determine the compensation which ought justly to be made to the owners of property or interests therein appraised by them as provided in section 13 of the condemnation law shall make their report of the value thereof to the supreme court within 100 days from the date of their qualification.

6. The persons or corporations whose property shall have been taken by condemnation and who shall have agreed upon the compensation to be paid therefor in settlement of the proceeding, or to whom an award of compensation shall have been made by the court, shall be entitled to payment of the agreed or awarded compensation within 3 calendar months after the date of the agreement upon the amount of the compensation or of the entry of the order confirming the report of the commissioners of appraisal, together with interest upon the amount of such compensation from the time of the entry and appropriation thereof by the power authority, to the date of payment of such compensation; but such interest shall cease upon the service by the power authority, upon the person or corporation entitled thereto, of a 15 days' notice that the power authority is ready and willing to pay the amount of such compensation upon the presentation of proper proofs and vouchers. Such notice shall be served personally or by registered mail and publication thereof at least once a week for 3 successive weeks in a daily newspaper, having a general circulation in the county where such property or any part thereof is located.

7. The power authority may, at its option, acquire such real property within the State of New York, under the general condemnation law.

8. The power authority and its duly authorized agents and employees may enter upon any real property for the purpose of making the surveys or maps mentioned in this section, or for such other surveys or examinations of real property as may be necessary or convenient for the purposes of this act.

9. The term "real property" as used in this act is defined to include lands, structures, franchises, and interests in land, including lands under water and riparian rights, and any and all other things and rights usually included within the said term, and includes also any and all interests in such property less than full title, such as easements, rights of way, uses, leases, licenses, and all other incorporeal hereditaments and every estate, interest or right, legal or equitable, including terms for years and liens thereon by way of judgments, mortgages, or otherwise, and also all claims for damages for such real estate.

Sec. 13. Forthwith upon their organization the trustees shall receive and take over the furniture, fixtures, books, maps, plans, records, reports, and other papers and property of whatsoever kind pertaining or belonging to or in the custody of the members of the St. Lawrence Power Development Commission, appointed under and pursuant to chapter 207 of the laws of New York for 1930, or in their possession or under their control as such commissioners, or held by them or for which they are responsible in their official capacity, together with such members of their administrative, engineering, marketing, and legal staffs as the trustees shall deem necessary or convenient for them to carry out and perform their duties. They shall take up, study, and consider the majority report of the said St. Lawrence Power Development Commission and more especially the policies and recommendations therein contained. Immediately upon the organization of the power authority after appointment and qualification of a quorum of the trustees thereof, and upon completing the transfer above prescribed, the members of the St. Lawrence Power Development Commission shall be discharged from the performance of all further duties; except that the chairman or in his absence the vice chairman shall be authorized to sign all vouchers for payment of obligations theretofore incurred until all such obligations are paid.

Sec. 14. The trustees shall receive no salary, but each trustee shall be paid his reasonable expenses in the performance of his duties hereunder, together with a per-diem allowance of $100 when traveling or rendering services as trustee, provided that the aggregate of such per-diem allowance to any one trustee in any one year shall not exceed the sum of $10,000.

Sec. 15. Three hundred thousand dollars is hereby appropriated out of any moneys in the State treasury not otherwise appropriated for the expenses of the power authority. The said sum so appropriated shall be paid out of the State treasury on the warrant of the comptroller upon vouchers signed by the chairman of the said power authority.

Sec. 16. All appropriations made by the State to the power authority shall be treated as advances by the State to the said power authority, and shall be repaid to it without interest either out of the proceeds of securities, or other obligations issued by the power authority for the construction of the project pursuant to the provisions of this act, or out of excess revenues from such project.

Sec. 17. If any term or provision of this act shall be declared unconstitutional or ineffective in whole or in part by a court of competent jurisdiction, then to the extent that it is not unconstitutional or ineffective such term or provisions shall be enforced and effectuated, nor shall such determination be deemed to invalidate the remaining terms or provisions hereof.

Sec. 18. The rates, services, and practices relating to the generation, transmission, distribution and sale of power to be generated from the project authorized by this act shall not be subject to the provisions of the public service law nor to regulation by, nor the jurisdiction of the department of public service, but shall be regulated and determined under the provisions of the contracts entered into by the power authority as provided in subparagraph 6 of section 5 of this act. The provisions of the public service law and of the conservation law and every other law relating to the department of public service or the public service commission or to the conservation department or commission or to the functions, powers or duties assigned to the division of water power and control by chapter 619, of the laws of 1926, shall, so far as is necessary to make this act effective in accordance with its terms and purposes be deemed to be superseded, and wherever any provision of law shall be found in conflict with the provisions of this act or inconsistent with the purposes thereof, it shall be deemed to be superseded, modified or repealed as the case may require. Sections 6, 7, 8, and 9 of chapter 207 of the laws of 1930 are hereby repealed.

Sec. 19. This act shall take effect immediately.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD].

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I almost feel like apologizing for taking any further time of the Senate, because the pending question was fully discussed yesterday. However, the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama, if agreed to, will seriously and very materially interfere with the board in carrying out the provisions of this measure.

The Senator himself has stated that all the authority they need is already contained in the bill. Then why in the name of common sense put a whole lot of provisions in and attach conditions with which the board must comply before they have a right to build a transmission line?

The Senator has stated that his amendment, as now modified to meet the objection I made to it yesterday, will leave the findings of the board final; and he says on that account they will not get into court, that there will be no danger of an injunction, but, Mr. President, every Senator knows that one cannot keep a man from going into court by enacting a statute which provides that he cannot go into court. The very first objection raised will be a constitutional one. If we require the board to get on their knees to the Power Trust before they may build a transmission line, it will be alleged—and they will make a good case on paper—that the board is taking property without due process of law, and that is forbidden by a provision in the Constitution of the United States. They can go to the Supreme Court of the United States; probably they will be defeated there; but suppose the board wanted to build a transmission line connecting 2 generating plants of the Government, 1 at Muscle Shoals and 1 at Cove Creek, is there any man who does not believe that the Government, owning those 2 generating plants, should not connect them by a transmission line? If the amendment should be agreed to, they could not do it unless they should go to the Power Trust and negotiate. Their hands would be tied by an act of Congress, while the hands of the Power Trust, with whom they would be dealing, would not be tied. Why not leave the board also free?

The Senator from Alabama has devoted a good deal of time to the Power Authority Act of New York, but any man who is familiar with that act and knows what has been done under it and knows the commission Roosevelt appointed under that law knows that the law was a compromise; that Roosevelt could not get what he wanted of the New York Legislature; it was controlled by the Power Trust to some extent; and he had to take what he could get.

I am not claiming and I do not want to claim and would not claim it if I knew it were true that Roosevelt is for the dotting of this "i" or the crossing of that "t". I am not trying to travel on anybody's coat tails; and when the Senator from Alabama is trying to get the Senate to vote an amendment in the bill because somebody has said it is Roosevelt's amendment, I say now, on my word of honor, here in the presence of the Senate, that if the Senator from Alabama can bring a statement from Roosevelt that—

Mr. BANKHEAD. I did not make the statement the Senator suggests.

Mr. NORRIS. I know the Senator did not, but he left the impression that it was Roosevelt's amendment.

Mr. BANKHEAD. No; I did not.

Mr. NORRIS. Let me finish. If the Senator from Alabama or anybody else can bring a statement from Roosevelt that he favors that amendment to this bill, I will promise to wire my resignation as a Member of the Senate to the Governor of my State within 10 minutes after it is produced. I am not claiming or trying to travel on the theory that I am doing just as the President wants, although I think I am. I would do what I thought it was my duty to do if he were going the other way; I am not boasting of that; but when it comes to the making of contracts with one of the greatest trusts that have ever been organized by mortal hands, I do not want to tie the hands of our agents so that they cannot connect Government property even with a line that the Government owns until they get down on their bended knees and secure permission from this trust, which has robbed more widows and orphans and other American citizens than any other trust which was ever formed in the history of the civilized world. Shall we go to them with our hands tied and manacled and ask, "Will you let us build a transmission line?" and when they reply "We will do it on this condition and that condition", and we say, "We cannot stand that; we are going to build it anyway", have them go into court?

The Supreme Court probably will finally decide against them under the Senator's amendment; I concede that; but Cove Creek Dam has been built during the intervening years, and we have paid several million dollars to the Power Trust for power with which to build that dam, when we have the power going to waste every minute right at Muscle Shoals. All we have to do is to build a transmission line to connect it and get that power for nothing.

Mr. NORRIS subsequently said: Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that at the conclusion of my remarks on the last amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama there may be inserted in the RECORD the testimony on the bill given by the Senator from Washington [Mr. BONE] before the Committee on Military Affairs of the House of Representatives.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the testimony was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF HON. HOMER T. BONE, A UNITED STATES SENATOR FROM THE STATE OF WASHINGTON

Senator BONE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I did not come down here this morning for the purpose of making a general statement. It had occurred to me that some of the gentlemen of your committee might desire to ask me some questions about the experience of my own city of Tacoma in the power business, because I understand that some allusion was made to Tacoma yesterday by private-power representatives. Having lived out there for over a third of a century, and having been very active in connection with building and developing our big municipal power system, as well as public power systems of the State, I thought I might with some advantage to your committee address myself to some of those questions.

The CHAIRMAN. What have been your contacts, please, Senator, with the public-utility enterprise of the city of Tacoma, and your opportunities for knowing?

Senator BONE. I have practiced law there for a quarter of a century, and have participated in all the campaigns that led to the creation of most of our present power system. I have represented communities in power inquiries, and have organized a number of mutual power companies in my State, among farmers that handled distribution problems. The last connection I had actively with the legal side of this question was representing the city of Centralia in the development of its municipal power system.

I have made some study of the legal and political aspects of the power question, and also some inquiry into the mechanical and physical aspects of it. In fact, I had to know something of that in order to participate in these campaigns.

The CHAIRMAN. It has been suggested here that there was a serious break-down at a certain time in the service rendered by the Tacoma municipally owned public utilities, and the suggestion, at least, was made that that fact is some argument against the municipal ownership of public utilities.

Senator BONE. Mr. Chairman, may I ask you a question? Was the suggestion made that that was attributable to municipal ownership, or was the intimation made that it was?

The CHAIRMAN. The intimation was at least this—I may not have caught it all—that a municipal utility is of necessity a unit operation, and since it is a unit, a derangement of the source of power for a unit would mean a complete derangement for the city affected.

Mr. MONTET. In all fairness, Mr. Chairman, I think the facts were stated, and I do not think there was any argument made about it.

The CHAIRMAN. I beg the gentleman's pardon, but I thought there were certain suggestions offered as a deduction from the facts. I say that in order that the Senator may understand the issue made.

Mr. MONTET. The Tacoma situation was first brought in by Mr. HILL as an example—I do not remember what.

The CHAIRMAN. It is irrelevant who brought it in, I think. That is entirely irrelevant. We will proceed.

Senator BONE. Perhaps I can give the answer.

In the winter of 1929 the Pacific coast suffered the greatest drought in its history. It was without parallel. The wells in that country that had never been dry within the memory of man, went dry. The water table lowered very materially on the entire Pacific coast. Streams went dry that had never been dry within the history of the Weather Bureau or Government authorities. The rainfall in that section was so low as to be without parallel. It went for months. Vast forest fires raged in the mountains in Washington and Oregon in the middle of the winter—a thing also without parallel in the history of this country; a phenomenon that was startling, to say the least. As a result all the hydroelectric power systems in the West, including those of the private companies, suffered a tremendous slump in power output.

The city of Tacoma, contrary to the idea that some folks have, is connected with the power system of the city of Seattle, and will subsequently be connected with the power system of the city of Centralia, in a big superpower system, publicly owned, in western Washington, and will ultimately have a pool of power of anywhere from a million and a half to two million horsepower, which is more, probably, than at present is developed by all the private power systems in that State.

Current is floated on the line now between the cities of Seattle and Tacoma in an intertie system, so that Tacoma in a pinch can draw on the Skagit plant, which is 100 miles north of Seattle, and Seattle can draw on Tacoma's Cushman and Nisqually hydro developments miles away, one of them 50 miles by airline, in the mountains. It constitutes a superpower system, quite as efficient, quite as effective, and in some respects, in my judgment, superior to that created by the private power companies in that section. It was built by capable engineers, and I have never heard a challenge against the efficiency of Tacoma's hydro system. It is said by competent engineers to be one of the finest in the world.

Prior to this water shortage and during the early period of it the city of Tacoma had a tie-in with a private company serving that section, called the Puget Sound Power & Light Co. We had been giving that company a considerable amount of current, more current than we had been getting from them, and while this drought was becoming worse and worse we were utilizing the water stored in our great Cushman basin in the Olympic Mountains, translating it into power, and sending it over our wires to this private power company, which was employing it to carry part of its load. But when this crisis came on, the Puget Sound Power & Light Co.—I want to write that name into the record, so that there will be no question about it—was finding itself hampered by this power shortage.

It was compelled then to build a big steam plant at Shelton in order to meet future contingencies of this kind, but it was unprepared to meet this situation. It was compelled to call on its customers to shift their power loads to keep its system from breaking down. It tied on great steam plants operated by private mills—for example, the Snoqualmie mills in Washington, operated by the Weyerhaeuser Timber Co., which gave it a substantial amount of current. It was compelled to, and did, tie on the power-generating equipment of a large number of sawmills in the State of Washington, at Everett and other places, and then when it became apparent that even that aid would not be sufficient to handle its load we found that it was drawing on another source of power which the public did not know it possessed.

Tacoma in the meantime had been aiding Seattle, and had been aiding this private power company, which was also importing power from eastern Washington. We asked—we were not compelled to, but did ask—for the use of the Lexington, which, as this committee knows, has tremendously powerful generating equipment on board. By cutting off approximately 9 percent of our power load, which would have meant merely the shifting of 1 or 2 big business enterprises in Tacoma, we could have ridden through that water shortage very nicely, but we did not want to cut off one single customer in Tacoma.

So we asked the Government to send the Lexington there for a little while to carry a small fraction of the load; about 3,000,000 kilowatt-hours, I think, was all they gave us; and she was there for 30 days. That permitted the somewhat limited supply of water in the Skykomish River to flood into the Cushman Basin and raise the volume of water in that basin a little so as to give us a greater margin of safety.

At that time the private power companies of the country sent broadcasts all over the country—including spokesmen who assume to speak generally for the power companies whose representatives testified here yesterday—that the city of Tacoma had been compelled to call on a Government agency to prevent a break-down. But the peculiar thing was that at that very moment the Puget Sound Power & Light Co. had a quiet, not known tie-in with the Government steam plant in the Bremerton Navy Yard at Bremerton, Wash., a large Government-owned steam plant that was pouring thousands of horsepower of energy into its broken-down system. It was using that agency of the Navy, which was exactly the same as using a battleship, to carry its power system, and it was not letting anybody know about it; and when we asked about it we could get no information about it.

I wired Senator DILL and asked how it was that the Puget Sound Power & Light Co. could use the Navy, while such a rumpus was being raised about Tacoma's utilizing another agency or another arm of the Navy. And in that inquiry I had occasion to look up the records of that company, and I found that the then Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Charles Francis Adams, was a director in every Stone & Webster power organization in this country, and the Puget Sound Power & Light Co. was a Stone & Webster power company; that Mr. Charles Francis Adams, the then Secretary of the Navy, was a director in that company and in the Old Colony Trust Co., fiscal agent of the company.

After I raised a question about it, we found that Mr. Adams had severed his connection with that company, but before doing that he had arranged for a company in which he was interested to carry on with the aid of the Navy. That fact was not made known to your committee, was it?

The CHAIRMAN. No; this is the first time I have ever heard it. I do not know whether any other member of the committee heard it or not, but I had not heard of it.

Mr. MAY. Do you mean his navy or our Navy? [Laughter.]

Senator BONE. I do not wish to use the possessive case. If I did, it was an inadvertence. But, nevertheless, the Secretary of the Navy had a monetary interest in the company that the Navy was serving in this crisis, and that fact was apparently very carefully concealed from the country.

Let me elaborate that statement a little further. By reason of and during this water shortage the Puget Sound Power & Light Co., a private company, up to a few years ago enjoying almost a practical monopoly in western Washington, was compelled to buy $900,000 worth of current outside, thereby very seriously curtailing its ability to continue dividends on its stock issues; and that year the Engineers Public Service Co. made a report that the company did spend that much in power purchases outside.

At that same time the private power company operating in Vancouver, British Columbia, a large city to the north of Tacoma, was so badly affected by the water shortage, it apparently lacking a steam stand-by plant, that the streets of that large city were darkened to save current; the street-car service was curtailed; interurban cars were pulled by steam locomotives; extra policemen were put on by the city of Vancouver to patrol its darkened streets; patrons of the company were urged to curtail domestic service, loads were shifted, and heating units were cut off; and it finally became so bad that a prominent official of that company in Vancouver issued this statement:

"Each day makes the situation more serious. The time has arrived when, in the public interest, we must request the cooperation of citizens toward conserving our power supply."

The Puget Sound Power & Light Co. issued a statement requesting its customers to shift their loads at various hours during the day so as to conserve its supply.

The CHAIRMAN. To stagger their loads?

Senator BONE. To stagger their loads. And had that water shortage continued very much longer, even the United States Government, with its big steam plant at the Bremerton Navy Yard, probably could not have saved Stone & Webster during this crisis, because this company was madly tying on every mill it could get in northwestern Washington.

That is a picture of what occurred out there, from the records. I have such a volume of records here that I would not burden the committee with further citations.

Tacoma now has developed and available for immediate use 202,000 horsepower of energy, with a maximum demand, I think, most of the time, of around 90,000 horsepower. The city has about half a million horsepower of hydroelectric energy available in sites filed on and open to develop. The city of Seattle is now developing a hydroelectric project on the Skagit River that will ultimately be able to deliver a million horsepower. That is aside from the 50,000-horsepower steam plant—50,000-kilowatt steam plant, I believe—owned by the city of Seattle, a 32,000-horsepower hydroelectric plant on the Cedar River. And Centralia, a small city to the south of Tacoma, has a small but efficient hydro plant of 7,500 horsepower ultimate development.

That will give the committee some idea of the power set-up in those three cities that lie within a few miles of one another.

The CHAIRMAN. What do you mean by "within a few miles of one another"?

Senator BONE. Seattle is 30 miles north of Tacoma—28 by air-line. Centralia is about 50 miles south of Tacoma. Centralia's power plant is on the Nisqually River a few miles below Tacoma's Nisqually power plant; and those plants are all going to be tied together, which will give them the ultimate opportunity of serving all western Washington with feeder lines.

Around the city of Tacoma, a few years ago, were created a number of farmer companies, organized by farmers to serve themselves with power, and they have given to this country what I believe is a very complete demonstration of the ability of the farmer not only to create a power system but to effectually serve himself with very cheap power. I think there are some 10 or 12 of those companies operating. I organized one at Gig Harbor in 1925 that has a thousand farm homes tied on.

Mr. COCHRAN. Senator, could you give us any idea of the cost to the farmers in those mutual companies?

Senator BONE. Yes; I am going to tell you that now.

These are corporate organizations of a mutual and cooperative character. They issue no stock. They give the farmer-member a membership certificate, for which he pays $75 or $100. That goes into a common fund out of which the system is built. Out of revenues they maintain the system in operating efficiency. They buy their power from the city of Tacoma, and they tap our power lines anywhere they can find them, in the city limits or out in the country. The city sells them power at the wholesale power rate, which begins at 2 cents per kilowatt-hour and drops down to 3 mills per kilowatt-hour. That is the lowest rate made by the city of Tacoma to anyone.

Mr. MAY. Three mills?

Senator BONE. Three mills.

The average rate the city was charging this company I mentioned, at a place called Gig Harbor—the Peninsula Light Co.—has run about 7 mills per kilowatt-hour. That current is distributed from their little granger line to their members, and they split the cost among themselves. It is a purely cooperative activity. Some of those little companies serve their members as far as 50 or 60 miles from Tacoma, out in the mountain regions, in the "sticks", and I have in mind one company, the Elmhurst Mutual, which makes this rate to its farmer-members—and you can contrast this with the rural rate of the Alabama Power Co. The little company in question makes this rate: 5 cents per kilowatt-hour for the first 20 kilowatt-hours and then 1 cent per kilowatt-hour for all additional consumption.

One farmer out there, Captain Waldwick, had the largest chicken ranch in America. He used in 1 month 13,000 kilowatt-hours of current. That cost him $130.80. I suggest to members of this committee that they get the Alabama Power Co.'s lowest schedule and find out what a farmer or a little business man would pay for 13,000 kilowatt-hours of current, and then contrast it with that price—$130.80 for 13,000 kilowatt-hours.

That charge on a competing private line in the State of Washington at the time this service was rendered would have cost the farmer over $600. The difference between $600 and $130.80 is about $469; and it cost Captain Waldwick $75 to join that company. So he saved in 1 month on the operation of his chicken ranch several times what it cost him to become a member of that company.

The result has been that the city of Tacoma has made it possible, by this generous attitude toward these farmers, for them to belong to little distribution systems all through Pierce County, and 3,000 little farm homes are now enjoying city power. Of course, the power companies did not like it, proclaiming it to be bolshevism and un-Americanism. Of course, I can understand that. But it was very profitable for the farmer who was raising chickens out there, and he regarded it as a perfectly legitimate example of self-help. It was exactly in line with advice being given him by the Government.

When these companies were started—and I think Mr. Murray will verify that; he has practiced law for a quarter of a century at Tacoma, and he was general counsel of my city for years while much of this was being done—these little farmer lines, when they were first built, were built by farmers who knew little or nothing about this business, and they joined and put up their little pole lines and got franchises from the county. Engineers were called in who gave them some help. A lot of these lines were built for about $600 per mile. They are generally 6,600-volt lines, built to conform to the State safety standards. The city of Tacoma not only was willing to have them do this, but in the early stages had city engineers go out and check the lines to see that they were built right, without any charge to the farmer; and in the early stages, in order to help those farmers, the city sold them cross-arms and hardware at wholesale prices. The city sold them these cross-arms and hardware at wholesale prices, so that the farmer might not be stuck by any private company.

That, in general, is a picture of the farmer lines. They are operating very successfully in Pierce County today. The day I left the State the legislature passed a bill to permit cities to freely sell power anywhere; and today there is being built in Washington a public superpower system.

The city of Tacoma has a debt today of about $38 per horsepower represented by outstanding utility-bond issues, with average maturities, I should say, of about 9 years; possibly 10 years. In a few years every dollar of that debt will be extinguished by the process of paying it off year by year, because the debt is in the form of serial bonds. The private company which is the chief competitor of the cities of Seattle and Tacoma in that district has outstanding about $425 per horsepower in stocks, bonds, notes, and debentures, all debts that constitute a never-ending burden and lien on the earnings of that system, and when Tacoma has her debt fully discharged and has no dollars per horsepower, to put it in curbstone English, invested in our plant there, the private company out there will be compelled to pay interest and dividends on $425 per horsepower. Now, members of this committee are too good business men not to understand what that sort of financial set-up means. It means that we will be able in Tacoma, without this burden of interest and dividends, to give the people in that section the cheapest light and power in the world; and Tacoma for years has been giving that city the cheapest light and power in this country.

The CHAIRMAN. Hydroelectric power?

Senator BONE. Partly steam, but mostly hydro.

I have in my files statement after statement, some supplied by Insull companies operating very efficient generating systems, to the effect that they had built and were building and developing steam plants that were infinitely more efficient than the best hydro plant in the United States.

So, if it be asserted that the hydro plant is more efficient than the steam plant, the answer is found in the statement of the private companies themselves. So, if there is any advantage, it is in favor of steam. I do not agree with the conclusion of private companies.

One other suggestion. If the city of Tacoma should continue to sell the amount of current it does now, and for that current it received the same average price that is received by private power companies in many big eastern cities, the city of Tacoma would be a city without taxes. The profits would run the city without levying one dollar of tax for any purpose.

Let me illustrate that specifically. In my home, in 1 month, I used, for all purposes, 2,249 kilowatt-hours of current. For that amount of current I paid my city $16.55.

I went to the city of Chicago in 1931 to speak before a public body there on the power question, and I checked that charge with the Commonwealth Edison of Chicago, to see what their charge would be for the same service. I not only checked it up with them, but I checked it up and compared it with the records of the department of that State which regulates the service charges of that utility, and also with the records available to me in my own office.

For the service for which my city charged me $16.55 Sam Insull's company would have charged me $98 in Chicago. The difference between $16.55 and $98 represents the reason the Insull Co. went on the rocks. It represents flagrant racketeering in the power business. It makes it easily understandable why Insull could give $20,000,000 to build a fine opera house in Chicago. The people there thought the charges were perfectly proper, because some department of the State had said that that was a perfectly proper charge. The Chicago company claims to possess the most efficient steam-generating plants in the country.

The CHAIRMAN. It was stated here by at least two gentlemen who have appeared before the committee that the bookkeeping methods of the municipalities that operate utilities are such as to not make a fair comparison between the privately owned and the publicly owned and operated utilities in this, that the municipally owned concerns do not show by their figures, among other things, adequate replacement reserves, so that after a while the municipally owned plant will be worn out and completely gone, and it will require a total initial investment to replace the whole thing.

Senator BONE. That is as accurate as the other statements made by private power propaganda agencies.

The city of Tacoma has been in the power business 40 years, and the system today is better than at any time in its history. Forty years' experience demonstrates the falsity of that statement, and it is not necessary to go beyond that.

The laws of the State of Washington require cities to set up a certain type of accounting in the handling of their power utilities. These regulations require the very thing that private companies say is not done. It is done.

The city of Tacoma takes from its gross revenues 7½ percent as a tax contribution to the city, and the power system is actually carrying a greater tax burden than the private companies there. Their average taxes paid to the State and its subdivisions amount to about 5 percent.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you mean that from the proceeds of the sale of current to your citizens, when you sell that current as cheaply as you do, 7 mills—

Senator BONE (interposing). That rate is in one particular case.

The CHAIRMAN. That is one class of rate?

Senator BONE. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. But you claim that in all classes the rates are lower than those of the privately owned utilities?

Senator BONE. I think so, with perhaps one exception in the country.

The CHAIRMAN. If you are using 7½ percent of your gross revenues to help discharge the expenses of government and are retiring the initial investment in your utility plants, you now owe about how many dollars per horsepower?

Senator BONE. About $38.

The CHAIRMAN. How many years will it take to retire that investment?

Senator BONE. The average life of these bonds is about 9 years. The great bulk of that bond indebtedness will be retired in the next decade.

Mr. HILL. Not refunded?

Senator BONE. Not refunded; no. It will be extinguished.

Mr. HILL. Paid off?

Senator BONE. Paid off. The capital will be written out and amortized completely.

Let me give you one illustration. I have often been on the platform with men representing private companies, and there is no answer to this principle of amortizing debt, and none is attempted.

I can give you a practical illustration of stock manipulation out West which is utterly indefensible and which is making the people turn to public ownership.

I will cite one or two instances to show the difference in public and private financing.

In 1908 the city of Tacoma authorized the building of a hydroelectric plant on the Nisqually River, about 35 miles from Tacoma.

The plant and the transmission line into the city of Tacoma cost $2,000,000. In 12 years, out of the earnings of that plant, giving our people the cheapest light and power rates in this country, we paid off and discharged every dollar of that capital debt, so that at the end of 12 years the city of Tacoma owned a $2,000,000 hydro plant without a dollar of investment left in the capital structure. It was ours just as much as though another Aladdin had rubbed another lamp and said, "Here is your power plant."

That plant has saved consumers millions of dollars.

One other illustration, to show you the nature of manipulation indulged in by power companies. And I will use names.

In my State, as in other States, unfortunately, private power companies are permitted to file on streams and control the stream flow.

Water is one of the greatest natural resources the people have.

A company called Northwestern Electric Co., which now is a wing of the American Power & Light Co., filed on a stream called the White Salmon River in southern Washington. They built a plant there to handle the stream flow. That plant cost that company $1,230,000. I want you gentlemen of the committee to remember that figure. That is the cost of a 15,000-horsepower hydroelectric plant.

The company floated securities for the purpose of financing that plant.

Then, against the bare water right which cost nothing except a tiny filing fee, a negligible amount, against that water right this company issued $10,424,000 in securities. That issue was based on a water right that cost nothing. That load of wind was practically eight times the capital cost of the plant itself, and was loaded on top of that capital cost.

That watered stock has been outstanding ever since that occurred, and for years this company has been paying 12 or 13 percent every year on this phantom value. That was tolerated under a system of so-called "State regulations", which did not "regulate."

If there is any system of regulation of private utilities that has ever been devised that regulates them, I have never run across it in studies I have made. The stock-jobbing swindle I have described was accomplished in a State which possesses a good regulatory system, as such systems go.

I think we are going to have a change out there. Mr. Murray, my associate, is now the chief of the State regulatory body, and some new laws were put on the statute books by the last legislature that may prevent such financial perversions in the future.

Those crimes have been tolerated by law, and the people tied into the lines of that private company have for years had to pay 12- or 13-percent interest on 10½ million dollars of wind which did not exist. That fraud was written into the capital structure of that company.

This illustrates why the people out there are getting weary of that sort of thing. That is why Tacoma can sell at the price that we do and make a million-dollar net profit in 1 year, and rapidly amortize the capital that was put into our plant. There is no water in the Tacoma power system.

Suppose we do not keep the same sort of bookkeeping set-up as the private company? We will in a few years have a $30,000,000 plant with not a dollar of debt against it.

There is no answer to the proposition of amortization of capital structure; I have never yet found a reputable lawyer who has been able to successfully challenge the soundness of this principle. It is unanswerable. In a few years a city will own its plant; it will write out the capital. It will eliminate interest and dividends. That permits a very simple rate structure.

If you pick up a rate card of a private concern, including the companies of any of the gentlemen who testified before you, you will find that some of these companies have many different schedules of a highly involved nature.

If you were to ask them to produce their rate schedules, you would find that there are so many different schedules that it would take a Philadelphia lawyer to figure out what they might charge you under certain conditions.

I was 3 hours with the Edison Commonwealth Co. in Chicago trying to find out what they should charge me for 2,249 kilowatt-hours of service for domestic use. They wanted to know how many hours we were going to use one appliance and another, and how many hours we were going to use the water heater, and so on. The inquisition became tiresome.

In Tacoma all of that is made so simple that a child can understand our rate structure.

I went into Pendleton, Oreg., to make some speeches a few years ago, and while I was there a farmer brought in a rate card, and I looked at it. He was charged on rate no. 74, and the farmer was unable to explain the basis of the charge. He could not understand it. Contrast that with the bill which the farmer pays, when he is charged 5 cents per kilowatt-hour for the first 20 kilowatt-hours and an additional 1 cent for each kilowatt-hour of additional service such as the farmer pays in Pierce County, Wash., on a mutual line.

The rate structures of the private companies are so complicated that few men understand them. Professor Ripley once told me that no living man could understand the involved set-up of a company like the Midwest Utility. Professor Ripley was one of the most brilliant men America has ever produced. The financial structures of private power combines have become so involved that the men who created them do not know what it all means. Witness the Insull mess and the Foshay smash.

The ramifications of the Insull company are typical of many of these power companies.

I fear, Mr. Chairman, that I have taken too much of your time, but it is a very interesting topic.

Mr. JAMES. Senator, several years ago 5 or 6 power companies were interested in getting the Cove Creek Dam and 7 or 8 other dams on the Tennessee River.

Yesterday and the day before, representatives of the same companies appeared before this committee and said that now that they had an opportunity to get the Cove Creek and other dams it would be far cheaper for them to put up their own steam plants. What do you think of that?

Senator BONE. Well, it is difficult to answer a question of that kind. I am not an electrical engineer.

Perhaps I could answer that, Mr. JAMES, by saying that out in our country 3 or 4 years ago, in the heat of one of these battles, the power companies suddenly announced that they did not think much of hydroelectric development; that perhaps it was not very efficient.

Then I made a statement, urging them to abandon their filings on all our streams. They said, "Oh, no."

My private opinion is that hydroelectric power as a primary source of power cannot be challenged.

I agree with their engineers that power can be made very cheaply in a modern high-pressure steam plant by the use of powdered coal or oil, and the new superheating devices now in use. These new types of machinery permit them to turn out power very cheaply.

But I do not believe that the best steam plan on earth, in the long run, can be anything more than just an ordinary competitor of a hydro plant, because the factor of depreciation in a good hydro plant is exceedingly small.

The Cushman plant in Tacoma will be there when my grandchildren are old men. It is built in solid rock, and if anything goes wrong with the turbines it can be corrected at a comparatively small expense.

In the steam plant the depreciation is a marked factor at best. Then again the steam plant requires what a hydro plant does not require. At best it requires more men.

If you go to our big Cushman plant near Tacoma, you will see that because of the use of improved machinery and the simpler operation we are operating that huge hydro plant with a handful of men.

There is a plant representing a $12,000,000 investment, with only a little handful of men to operate it.

The plant is almost automatic. The flow of water can be automatically stopped. Then if the city wants power, some fellow in the city hall can push a button, and a man in the plant pushes a button and the current starts flowing again.

An efficient hydro plant is one of the marvels of this age of industrial marvels. I do not believe that the best steam plant on earth can compete with it.

When the private power companies say they do not want the hydro resources of this country, they misinform everybody.

In our State the private power companies have filed on every second-foot of water power in the State, and they are going to hang on to it until we take it away from them by the competition of publicly owned plants.

Mr. Goss. Is there any place on the Skagit River that can be used for a publicly operated plant?

Senator BONE. The city of Seattle is building a big plant on that river.

Mr. HILL. What is your answer to the proposition made by the private power companies that the fact that the private power companies have to pay taxes, whereas a municipal power plant does not, gives the municipal plant a great advantage.

Senator BONE. That is not true. In the first place, the private power companies do not pay taxes. They merely collect taxes in additional rates and pass them on to the State. Taxes are allowed as an operating cost; the owners of private power companies do not pay taxes.

In the State of Washington, so that this record may be clear, the average amount of taxes paid by private companies in 1929 and 1930 to the State and its subdivisions was about 5 percent of their gross receipts.

Let me give the committee a practical illustration of this tax business.

The power gentlemen who have discussed the tax question in our State have largely quit talking about it. In 1924 we had a big power battle in the State. The private power companies distributed a million or more of the pamphlet I show you to the voters of the State, in which they said that public ownership of power would remove from the tax rolls $300,000,000 of power property privately owned.

Then their spokesmen went all over the State proclaiming that they had $300,000,000 worth of property on the tax rolls.

I prodded them and got them to say that a thousand times. I got every newspaper in the State to repeat this assertion, so that it is now in the record and cannot be removed.

The average tax rate that year in the State of Washington was 70 mills. Every other citizen was being assessed 70 mills on 50 percent of his property value. The total tax paid by all the private power companies on all their power properties was $661,569.90. That represented a 70-mill tax on a total value of $9,450,000.

In other words, these men had told the public they were being taxed on a $300,000,000 value. They went to the public in that power battle with that statement as the foundation of their defense. It was utterly false. The company had able lawyers, men whom the people had a right to believe were telling them the truth. Over their own signature they said they had $300,000,000 of property on the tax rolls, and yet they paid taxes on $9,450,000, or less than one thirtieth of what they said they had on the tax rolls.

In 1930 we had another power fight. That year I had helped draw a measure known as "the Grange power bill." We had another power fight in Washington that year, and some of the newspapers said that between 1924 and 1930, $100,000,000 had been added to the tax rolls by the private power companies, making a total tax value of $400,000,000 in 1930.

The average tax that year was 70 mills. All of the private power companies in Washington paid that year $1,174,678.79 in taxes to the State and its political subdivisions.

On the basis of a 70-mill tax the power companies were paying taxes on a total value of $16,781,000. The ratio still continued, about one thirtieth of claimed value.

In other words, these private power companies have practically all of their property values off the tax rolls in the State of Washington. I found that that is largely true in many other places.

In my own county of Pierce, in a period of 7 years, by some peculiar manipulation, the values of properties of the Puget Sound Power Co. were reduced 40 percent for taxation purposes, while in the same 7 years the values on every little home in the county were increased 40 percent for taxation purposes.

As these companies were getting this tremendously valuable property off the tax rolls, every little home was being assessed more and more to take up the growing burden of government.

I might give you one or two more illustrations. This is a very practical thing, and you have a right to know some of the practical aspects of it.

If by competition from publicly owned plants in the State of Washington we could have reduced the average price of current to the consumer one tenth of 1 cent per kilowatt-hour, that reduction in itself would have saved consumers far more than all of the taxes paid by all of the private companies in the State of Washington. That saving alone would be more than all the taxes that they paid to the State and its subdivisions. That is, 1 mill per kilowatt-hour saving on the power and light rate would have more than offset all the taxes paid by the companies to the State.

In the State of Washington the tremendous driving force of public competition has reduced power rates until the Puget Sound Power Co. claims that its rates are the cheapest of any private power company in the United States.

Why does that power company give that cheap rate? Public competition, actual and potential, is the answer.

Why should the Insull Co. in Chicago charge more to the home owner in Chicago, in a large congested center where, according to all power spokesmen, distribution is cheapened, than do we when we have to send the power out over a line which serves the farmer far out in the "sticks"?

The answer is this, because where there is this public competition the power company gives the farmer a better rate. Our private power companies give the farmer a better rate than the people get in Chicago, where they ought to have the cheapest power and light in the world, and where Sam Insull told the people he was producing power at the cheapest rate in the country.

The Chicago Insull Co. has claimed that their plant is the best in the country. That may be true. They should give the benefit of this efficiency to the consumers instead of looting their pocketbooks in excessive rates.

Mr. HILL. When was this shortage of water that you speak about?

Senator BONE. In the winter of 1929.

Mr. MONTET. What capital outlay has the Tacoma project in its construction that you say produces one and one half to two million horsepower?

Senator BONE. That is not Tacoma. That is the combined ultimate output of the Seattle, Tacoma, and Centralia plants.

Mr. MONTET. Do you know what capital outlay would be involved?

Senator BONE. Tacoma's Cushman system, when completed, will cost about $72 per horsepower. I would rather have you ask Mr. Murray those questions relating to cost. He handled the legal end of that work.

The Tacoma system now, measured by private power standards of value, would be worth at least $30,000,000, and we have about $8,000,000 debt standing out against it, and that will soon be amortized.

Mr. COCHRAN. What are the principal private power companies operating in the State of Washington?

Senator BONE. We have the Northwestern Electric Co., which is a subsidiary of the American Power & Light Co., operating in southwestern Washington and in Portland, Ore.

In the middle and southern part of the State an organization known as the "Pacific Power & Light Co.", which is another subsidiary of the American Power & Light Co., enjoys a monopoly. In eastern Washington the Washington Eastern Power Co., another wing of the American Power & Light Co., operates with a similar monopoly.

In the western and northwestern part of the State the Puget Sound Power & Light Co., a Stone & Webster corporation, occupies the field.

These are the 4 major private power organizations in the State, and 3 of them are controlled by 1 outfit.

Mr. COCHRAN. Then Stone & Webster and the American Power & Light are the two holding companies?

Senator BONE. That is right. The Engineers Public Service Corporation of Boston is the parent company of the Puget Sound Power & Light Co.

Mr. COCHRAN. Will you answer similarly as to the power companies operating in the State of Oregon?

Senator BONE. In the south is what is called the "Copco" (California-Oregon Power Co.), in that part of the State around Grants Pass, Medford, and Ashland.

In the central part of the State are small units owned by larger companies. The Yamhill Electric Co. and some other smaller organizations are controlled by other companies whose identity I am not familiar with. In the northern part of the State is the Portland Electric Power Co., called the "Pepco", having the same initials as the local company here.

The Pacific Power & Light Co. also operates in Oregon.

Mr. COCHRAN. Are the operating companies in Oregon owned by the holding companies?

Senator BONE. Yes.

Mr. COCHRAN. What are the holding companies?

Senator BONE. The Portland Electric Power Co. was taken over some time ago by an eastern concern; there was a shift in the stock. In this transaction there was an exchange of stock at around $62 per share, with a subsequent drop in value to about $3 a share. There was a loss of millions to the people in Portland who were unfortunate enough to buy that trash. Such a clamor followed that efforts are being made to prevent another scandal; and some hope is entertained that losses may be avoided.

Mr. COCHRAN. Are holding companies superimposed upon holding companies in those two States, in the financial set-up of those companies, or is there simply one holding company holding the stock of the operating companies out there?

Senator BONE. I cannot give you any information about that that would be of any value to you. The American Power & Light Co. is a holding company. The operations of the California & Oregon Power Co. are tied in with some southern company. They have a most elaborate set-up, but just what it is, I do not know. That seems to be a thing that possesses a fatal fascination for them—that is, to try to get as highly involved a capital set-up as possible.

Mr. COCHRAN. In your view of the matter, where there is one holding company holding the stock of various operating companies, is that capital set-up justified from the economic standpoint?

Senator BONE. Invariably, there is a temptation to inflate the capital structure. It is very easy for any holding company to do that. It can juggle its properties between subsidiaries as the Insull outfit did. The thing that I dislike about it is the lack of simplicity, and the manipulation made possible by a capital structure so highly involved. I would condemn them for their abuse of stock manipulation and the juggling of properties.

Mr. COCHRAN. Do you think that a holding company is justified where the various operating companies operate in different States, under different utility laws?

Senator BONZ. Congressman, I am sorry that I cannot answer you in a way that will give you much enlightenment. I must content myself by saying that if the men operating these companies were content to make a fair and reasonable return on their legitimate investment, much of the criticism that I and others have directed at them would fall of its own weight, because there would be no ground for criticism. But they are not content to do this. Just a short time ago, a high official, I think it was the Chancellor of the Exchequer of England, delivered a speech in Chicago before a large audience, in which he proclaimed Samuel Insull to be one of the greatest citizens of the world. I am not attempting to quote him except in substance. He said that it was an unfortunate thing that we did not have more men like Mr. Insull to guide us in the paths of glory with their transcendent genius. He thought it would be a marvelous thing for every country to have men like Mr. Insull at the head of public and private enterprises.

Now, at that very moment, the Insull debacle was impending and that was the worst mess that this country ever experienced. The South Sea bubble was nothing in comparison to it.

Mr. COCHRAN. I have asked these questions in view of the questions that were asked Mr. Owen D. Young and others before the Norbeck committee, and their answers justifying the existence of one holding company holding the stock of operating companies that operated in different States.

Mr. MAY. Senator, in view of the fact that you are a Member of the United States Senate and in view of the fact that myself and these other gentlemen who are considering this matter are Members of the House of Representatives, where these questions are pending for solution, I want to see if I can agree with you upon some fundamental principles involved in the legislation, as it is proposed, and whether or not, if we agree upon those things, you have some good suggestion that you can make to this committee looking to a solution of the problem. Now, first of all, Senator, do you agree with me that the water-power resources of this country are a natural inheritance of the people and should be preserved as nearly as possible for the use and benefit of all the people?

Senator BONE. I do, thoroughly.

Mr. MAY. Do you agree with me that, upon the principles of equity, in approaching this question the question ought to be solved by some form of legislation, with a guaranty of absolute protection to the interests of the Government and of the public and with as little injury as possible to the investments of others who are concerned?

Senator BONE. I think that would naturally follow.

Mr. MAY. You agree with me, no doubt, that we, as members of this committee, and you, as a member of committees of the United States Senate, should approach this question absolutely fairly and impartially, with a view to determining the right thing to be done.

Senator BONE. Yes.

Mr. MAY. Now, with those fundamentals agreed upon, I should like to ask you, Senator, if you have read the report of the St. Lawrence Power Development Commission in connection with the proposed improvement of the St. Lawrence waterway?

Senator BONE. I am preparing to go into that very thing. I am not exactly familiar with that set-up, but I have taken the subject up, and I intend to inform myself in regard to it. Therefore, I would prefer not to be interrogated with regard to that, with a view to obtaining any definite figures and information, until I am thoroughly advised as to what is intended to be done.

Mr. MAY. In view of that answer I will not go into the details of that matter with you now, but I want to call your attention to the letter of transmittal, dated January 15, 1931, of the New York State Power Authority, transmitting the report to the Governor and Legislature of New York.

There are 20 different findings set out in the letter, together with 15 or 20 recommendations made. At this time I want to call your attention to the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth findings of the commission, and will ask you for an expression of your views on them.

Mr. HILL. At what page?

Mr. MAY. Page 10. Finding no. 13 seems to me to fit right in with the situation at Muscle Shoals, and I should like to call your attention to it and ask an expression of your views on it. It reads as follows:

"It is practicable to encourage certain types of industry to locate at or near the site of the power house, and a demand from such industries can be assured within a reasonable time, sufficiently substantial to finance the project, if a public power or authority be created and authorized to solicit and make contracts."

The fourteenth finding reads as follows:

"However, in order to bring the benefit to the domestic and rural consumer, and in view of the fact that elaborate facilities are already in existence, the best solution of the problem of marketing St. Lawrence power involves the utilization of existing transmission and distribution systems under a contract with operating companies which will, at the same time, assure the companies affected remuneration for the service they perform and assure to the consumers to the largest extent the development by the public power authority of this low-cost power."

Do you agree with that statement?

Senator BONE. As I understand the reading of it, that simply means that the lines of the companies shall be used to carry the current. That is a purely mechanical process, and they might transmit energy over one of those lines, for which they could be paid proper transmission charges. I would not want to quarrel with them if they wanted to do that, but if it is to their interest to build a transmission line alongside an existing one, they should have the power to do so. Let me suggest that my idea is, and always has been, that there should be no restriction on any public agency to deliver power at any point at which they want to deliver it. The mechanism by which the delivery is accomplished is not of such vital importance as that the power be reserved under which to make the delivery. Do I make myself plain?

Mr. MAY. Quite so. I call your attention to the fifteenth finding, which is as follows:

"It is not economically wise to parallel existing transmission or distribution systems, except as a possible solution in the event of failure of the private utility company to enter into a contract with the power authority on a fair and equitable basis."

Now, what do you think of that finding, in view of the pending legislation?

Senator BONE. Well, if the power authority that is set up has the power reserved, but cannot build transmission lines, then, in the event it might not be able to enter into such arrangements with private companies to transmit the power for it, it would face a very serious situation. That would be a serious objection. I would want the power reserved to build lines, and then, with the power reserved, private companies could buy power, and private concerns could deliver power for the authority on the basis of a proper carrying charge.

Mr. MAY. Being a lawyer, you are no doubt familiar with the rule that before condemnation proceedings can be resorted to for the purpose of acquiring the property of an individual by a corporation for public use, it is essential that an effort be made to contract for the property.

Senator BONE. That is not the rule in the State of Washington. You may condemn property for any public purpose.

Mr. MAY. But do you not have to make an effort to contract for it before instituting condemnation proceedings?

Senator BONE. No; not under our constitution and laws. I have condemned a million dollars' worth of property that was desired by a public client of mine. We did attempt to buy it first, but they would not sell it. But it is not a requirement under our law that offers be first made.

The CHAIRMAN. In other words, that is not a legal prerequisite? Senator BONE. No; not in my State. I do not know what may be the law as to that in other States, but that is not the rule of law that obtains in the State of Washington.

Mr. MAY. As a principle governing the dealings of one man with another, would you be in favor of a provision in this bill providing that, where transmission lines already existed, or any other property existed that the Government would want to acquire for the furtherance of its purposes, the property be sought to be acquired through agreement with the owner before condemnation?

Senator BONE. Certainly; I believe, in the first place, that it is economically unsound to have two railroads paralleling each other, or two power lines paralleling one another. That is a fundamental economic error; but, on the other hand, I would not consciously, and I certainly hope that the committee would not consciously, report out a bill which in any wise ties the hands of that power system, because, if you do, you crucify that authority at the start. I would confer all the rights and powers upon the public body that other bodies have. I want the public body to have every power that the private concern has in this field. I think the public body should be placed in the same position as the other body, and that anything short of that would be a betrayal of the public interest.

Mr. MAY. The public body should have more authority.

Senator BONE. I would give it unlimited power. If this Government is not entitled to that power, then it is not worth preserving. We must have faith in something, and if we do not have faith in our own Government, we have nothing left. We are witnessing all over the world today the breakdown of parliamentary systems, and I do not want to see that occur in this country. My own boy may, at some day, be called upon to put a gun on his shoulder and fight for the country, and I want to have faith in the Government that he may be called upon to defend.

Mr. MAY. That is the very reason I asked you if you did not think the public authority should have a little leeway.

Senator BONE. I would give it every power that it should have. I know that if I were the public official charged with operation of such a system I would want every power to dicker with private concerns. Then, if they would not listen to reason, I would want power to club them into a spirit of decency and fair play. The private companies now have the power of condemnation. One of those Wall Street combines can come into my State and, under the laws of the State of Washington, if you had a piece of property there that they wanted to utilize for a private power plant, they would not have to say one word to you. The first thing that you know you would be presented with a summons to appear in court. The jury or the court would fix the price of the land. A preliminary offer is not necessary.

Mr. MAY. Do you mean to say that your State laws are so lame and inefficient that they allow a private corporation to take the property of a private citizen without seeing if they could agree with him as to the amount that should be paid?

Senator BONE. Exactly that.

Mr. MAY. Then that law should be amended. You are an advocate of public ownership, are you not?

Senator BONE. For electric power, yes; very completely and thoroughly.

Mr. MAY. Assuming that you are an expert, which I think you have manifested in your statement, and that your long years of practice as a lawyer makes you thoroughly familiar with the basis or reason for hypothetical questions, I should like to ask you this question: Assuming that down around Muscle Shoals, in Alabama, Tennessee, and Georgia, there is already invested about $400,000,000 of people's money, distributed widely among individuals, corporations, and private interests of those three States; and, assuming further that the record here shows, or that the evidence shows, that since the 1st day of last January, or about that time, there has been a heavy depression in the value of the stocks and bonds of those companies, based upon a rumor or report that Muscle Shoals power would be utilized over transmission lines to be provided for the distribution and sale of electricity, and assuming further that the statement here, so far uncontradicted, discloses that this investment, involving the sum of $400,000,000, would be practically destroyed, would you say that it would be proper and right for this committee to report out a bill authorizing the Government board or authority to approach that subject arbitrarily, without making an effort to deal with any of those 3, 4, 5, or 6 private power companies, with this investment held by women, children, trust companies, insurance companies, banks, and so forth, and without making some effort to use them in the proper utilization of this natural resource?

Senator BONE. No; I think that the power authority should be given the same power that private power companies have—that is, the power to negotiate and the power to condemn. I would give this power authority in this instance the same power that the State of Washington, or my own State, gives to the Puget Sound Power & Light Co. A company in my State can come to me and say, "Mr. BONE, you have a piece of land that we want to utilize. How much will you take for it? We will give you $1,000 for it." Then I may say, "I think my land is worth $5,000"; and they may say, "We will not pay that much for it." Then the next day I am served with a summons in a condemnation suit. Now, I would give the public authority that same power. I say that because that power resides not only in public and private power corporations, but it extends to almost every form of utility organization in the United States. I would give them the power to negotiate and to dicker. We have no more right to assume that the United States Government, through its properly constituted agencies, would go into those States and try to rob anyone than we would to assume that a private power company would do it. I think we could trust the Government agency to treat people fairly under this system. However, I would accept with a great deal of salt the statement that they have an investment of $400,000,000. They usually magnify such investments, or that has been my experience. However, that is neither here nor there, because the man with $10 is as much entitled to protection as the man with 10 cents.

Mr. MAY. You will agree with me that a lot of the public condemnation of power companies in this country is attributable, perhaps, to some of their sharp practices and to some of their methods of financing.

Senator BONE. It is due to the fact that they are trying to earn a return on wind and water that has been written into their rate structures. That is a trouble that cannot be gotten at except through competition; so-called "regulation" has utterly failed to do it.

Mr. MAY. Of course, you want that wind and water taken out of them, and their earnings based only on their legitimate investment.

Senator BONE. Yes. However, under our system of law, that form of private ownership is only entitled to the protection that the law gives to other forms of private ownership; and that protection of private rights, or the recognition of that right of protection, certainly should not be coupled with any right of recognition of earnings on something that does not exist. Men should not be allowed to earn return on phantom dollars or have such practices validated by law or regulation.

Mr. MAY. You do not believe that the Government should take a farmer's piece of land, nor that a power company should take a piece of land and make use of it, without first making just compensation therefor, do you?

Senator BONE. That cannot be done under the Constitution.

Mr. MAY. You do not believe that should be done, do you?

Senator BONE. No. Even if you wrote such a provision into law, it would be a nullity.

Mr. MAY. Assuming that the evidence here shows that in order to develop the additional power facilities that would be created by the construction and operation of the Cove Creek Dam, and to build Dam No. 2 or Dam No. 3, whichever it is, would cost some $55,000,000 to $60,000,000, leaving entirely out of consideration the question of flood control and navigation, do you believe that the Government of the United States would be justified, in order to utilize the power at Muscle Shoals, to expend that much money, rather than to undertake to determine what should be done through some public tribunal established by the Government, like the Federal Power Commission, or some other public tribunal that would be supposed to have the Government's interest at heart?

Senator BONE. I will answer that question by saying this: That, in my experience, I know of no system of regulation that has been effective. I am not asserting by that that it cannot possibly be done, because that would be to assert something which might not be true. But, in my judgment, it has never yet been accomplished.

Mr. MAY. That would be taking back what you said about having faith in the Government.

Senator BONE. Yes. I know of no system of regulation that has ever been successful. We have a regulatory law in the State of Washington, and I think ours was based largely on that of Massachusetts, where the power companies were in the saddle. We adopted that law in 1911, and up to this time we have had a commission. We thought we would have a new deal in Washington under that law, but under this so-called "regulation", this White Salmon River monstrosity that I referred to was accomplished. A bare water right was written into the capital stock of the company for eight times the cost of the power plant. That thing occurred under a system of State regulation which we regarded as second to none. I do not believe it is possible to regulate rates successfully under the present system. I think we are all sufficiently practical to understand just what I mean by that. From the very moment a system of public regulation was adopted, the companies that were to be regulated went into politics in order to regulate their regulators, and they have done a fine job of regulating themselves. In my State, at every session of the legislature, there has been a power lobby at Olympia, and a lot of whisky and a lot of money have been in evidence.

Mr. MAY. I gather from your entire statement that there has been a lot of unusual abuse by public utilities out there, and that you have been in a battle with them for some 20 years on the side of the people; and, doubtless, as a result of that you are in the United States Senate. If I am correct about that, I should like to know if you feel that this committee should act entirely upon the prejudices which may have been formed because of those abuses, or should we approach the subject with a view of trying to do equity as between all of the parties concerned?

Senator BONE. With the worst of our experience in Washington, our rates were not as high as they were in Chicago. I am endeavoring to speak about protection, not only to the Public Treasury, but to the pocketbooks of the people who pay these excessive rates. By these excessive rates there has been taken out of the pocketbooks of the people enough in excessive charges to pay the tax bills of those people. These abuses are not confined to Washington State. They are part and parcel of private ownership of a highly profitable business.

I have seen the profits from a power system pay the entire operating costs of a local government. There are little cities in Washington today that have no city taxes at all, because they own their lighting systems and run the city out of light revenues. Yet their rates are cheaper than those of the surrounding communities served by private companies. I know that most people do not understand the relation between light and power rates and the cost of government. If Tacoma charged the ungodly rates that are exacted by the Insull outfit in Chicago, we would have no city taxes at all in Tacoma. In other words, my own city of Tacoma, with its population of 107,000, would be free of municipal taxes. Now, that is full of meaning to me as a lawyer who has represented taxing bodies for many years. It is a very practical proposition. I have people coming to me saying, "This terrific tax burden is crushing us," and I tell them as a lawyer representing a public body that I am going to try to find some way to remove that burden.

When we know that progress makes possible the removal of some of this tax burden there is only one answer to it: The only way by which we will ever get at this thing is not by the regulation of these companies, because they have built up a capital structure of stocks and bonds which frequently bears no relation to actual investment. You speak of the stocks and bonds issued by these southern companies, and I ask you, Shall the people forever carry the burden of those stocks and bonds? I know that a lot of this stuff has been sold to innocent investors, but that is no reason why society should forever carry that burden.

Mr. MAY. Following all those things, do you think it good policy for the Government to approach this subject of Muscle Shoals development in the Tennessee River Valley, with an expenditure of about $60,000,000, before making some other effort, in honest good faith, to work out a solution without the expenditure of that money?

Senator BONE. I do not see how the Government could go into the field of intrastate rates effectively, or at all.

Mr. MAY. You realize that it can acquire property by contract, if it needs it?

Senator BONE. Yes, sir; but I understood you to suggest the propriety of regulation.

Mr. MAY. I am leaving that for the moment.

Senator BONE. I do not see how the Government, by any system that we can create, can have any effective check on intrastate rates.

Mr. MAY. Let me get right down to my question, if I understand you, and I think I can: Do you believe that the Government ought first to lay out an expenditure down there amounting to approximately $60,000,000, before we adopt some plan, or should we try to solve the problem before making that expenditure of money?

Senator BONE. I will answer that in this way: I do not see how we can adopt any other course than that laid out in the Muscle Shoals bill, because that, in my judgment, is the most effective regulator that we can have.

Mr. MAY. Would you direct that board or authority, as one of these bills implies, to undertake to work out a solution of the distribution of power in the Tennessee River Valley through contracts or agreements with private power companies that already have systems of transmission and distribution, or would you go out and start up full competition with them in the distribution of power by providing competing transmission lines, to begin with?

Senator BONE. I think it would be perfectly proper to have a provision in the bill authorizing the power authority to enter into arrangements or agreements with the private companies to transmit over their lines. That power might well be conferred in the bill as one of the powers of the commission.

Mr. LLOYD. We have been told here by the representatives of the power interests, it may be assumed, that there were outstanding securities amounting to some $400,000,000 that are going to be vitally affected by this bill, if passed. We are told, too, that not only is it immoral to destroy all of that wealth that they say will be destroyed by the passage of the bill, but we are threatened with further trouble in our national financial structure by the lack of security that will remain in investments. Have you any particular thought on that question? In other words, they say that it will wipe out $400,000,000 of investments which will bring a further calamity to our national economic life.

Senator BONE. I do not agree with that. In the first place, that charge is based on the assumption that you are going to wipe it all out. It has wiped itself out largely. Insull's outfit wiped out a billion of that sort of thing in a section of the country where there was no public competition.

Manifestly, there is something inherently vicious in a financial set-up that destroys itself. It is, I think, a wrong assumption to indulge in, to assume that because the Government goes in there that you are going to destroy that investment. After all, that is not true. It seems to me that that assertion is based on the assumption that you are going in there and seize something; that just cannot be done. Private power companies out in my country boast that they can compete with public plants.

Mr. LLOYD. That is all, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Let me interpolate at this point that one answer comes in from a letter which was just handed me written by a Mr. Ross B. Mateer, of 1869 Wynnewood Road, Philadelphia, Pa., and dated April 14. Mr. Mateer addresses this to me and says:

"This clipping in the Philadelphia Evening Ledger of April 14 is amazing, and you might ask Mr. Wilkie if this $400,000,000 is the value he places on the outstanding 31,000,000 shares of common stock of Commonwealth & Southern Corporation? If so, it might be wise to wipe out the $400,000,000, which represents water-multiple shares of stock issued in exchange for split-up stock of Southeastern Power & Light Corporation and Commonwealth Power Corporation.

"The writer is a stockholder, one of the many stung by this Morgan-Bonbright pyramiding. The writer still owns his stock and would welcome any program which would outlaw this corporation, even though it means an absolute loss. The general effect, preventing repyramiding of holding corporations, would be beneficial. Mr. Wilkie and his associates would also be interested in this statement."

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, if you will allow me, I should like to ask the Senator a question on a matter that is in my mind, at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well.

Mr. MAY. Senator, in your recital of conditions prevailing in the State of Washington and the accomplishments of your public operation and ownership system of Tacoma out there, and in the course of your narration of what the approximately 3,000 farmers did, you made the statement that the private power companies are simply going broke; that these private company organizations out there are going broke; is that correct?

Senator BONE. Yes; they are going broke; that is, in my judgment.

Mr. MAY. Is it due to Government operation and control?

Senator BONE. No. It is due to the very thing that made Insull go broke, that has made a lot of these companies go broke, where there was no public competition.

I do not know whether you gentlemen follow the press reports, but you will notice, if you do, that a great many of these power companies are in the hands of receivers right now in sections of the United States where there is no active public competition.

As you know also, there was really no competition with Insull. A lot of power combines will go broke for the reason that they are trying to accomplish the impossible. They have flooded their capital structures with huge flotations of wind and water, upon which they try to pay interest and dividends at a time when the public is practicing thrift and using less and less current. Revenues are dropping while the racket of stock selling is coming to an end.

The Puget Sound Power & Light Co. now has ceased to pay dividends on its preferred stock. It is not paying dividends on its common stock, and if this depression continues, they may not be able to pay necessary interest on their bonds.

Mr. MAY. Then the public ownership competition, taking their trade and business away from them, has not had anything to do with it?

Senator BONE. It has not had such a material effect as some would think, although it has done this: it has forced the Puget Sound Power & Light Co. to make rate reduction after rate reduction.

Mr. MAY. Does not that bring about a reduction in revenue?

Senator BONE. Surely; very material reduction.

Mr. MAY. Thereby helping to eliminate their dividends.

Senator BONE. That is true.

Mr. MAY. All right, then, would not competition by the Government down in Alabama destroy the stocks of the Alabama Power Co. in that way?

Senator BONE. It might affect the market value of their stocks, probably considerably; for a time.

Mr. MAY. That is the point I had in mind.

Senator BONE. Just as the intrusion of a chain-store organization into any community destroys the value of the business of any local independent merchants in that community, which is a perfectly legal piece of business, and so recognized.

Mr. FADDIS. Senator, with reference to this matter of the wiping out of the value of these stocks, if a citizen of the United States were to go down the street and someone asked him if he would change a $50 bill, let us say, and he receives a $50 counterfeit bill, he has no recourse from the Government for that exchange. If he can prove the transaction, the Government will, of course, prosecute the case.

Take the case of these stocks that the public generally believed to be composed largely of wind and water. Are they not in the same position as the person holding a counterfeit bill?

Senator BONE. These companies simply sold the people counterfeits; the prior preference, pluperfect, superheterodyne stock they unloaded was counterfeit. Insull's graft is a fine example. Foshay is another. I used to be in a prosecutor's office when I was a young fellow, and while I was a deputy there I saw lots of fellows put behind the bars for taking a loaf of bread or for some other minor offense. I say that these big fellows have gone unwhipped, while they were unloading billions of dollars of worthless trash on the country. I am beginning to wonder where our standards of justice in the United States are going.

We have been very tender in handling these fellows. Our solicitude for them has been one of the outstanding facts of recent political history.

Mr. FADDIS. That is exactly my point. In your opinion, then, does the Government owe any obligation to protect someone who has blindly bought a lot of worthless stock, which the public is paying for over and over again year after year?

Senator BONE. I know of no other field in which the Government is doing that. Perhaps some member around the table can suggest where the Government is protecting other groups who are doing that.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FADDIS. Yes.

Mr. MAY. In line of your question, do you know how and can you tell this committee how to protect these widows and orphans, women and children in this country, who have these investments, and, at the same time, get the wind and water out of these power companies' stocks?

Senator BONE. It is one of the inherent defects of our system that men who are almost criminals at heart are permitted to do this sort of thing and Congress year after year fails to create a protective device that will stop such operations.

Mr. MAY. Then you are for the securities bill that is pending in Congress?

Senator BONE. Well, I do not want to answer that. But year after year these abuses have grown. They have become a Frankenstein monster, and now the question, as I view it, is this: Shall we sacrifice public interest now? We are at the parting of the ways. We have either got to take one route or the other. We have now got to correct these abuses. Of course, somebody may have to suffer. I am sorry that that is true. I am as sorry as anyone can be that someone has to suffer. Widows and orphans do not own so much of this stock as you think. Some pretty healthy male adults own this stock. I have heard this widows-and-orphan business ever since it was first suggested that we have any kind of social legislation. Since then the cry of "widows and orphans" has been raised when any intrenched wrong was challenged by those with social vision.

Possibly some widows and orphans do own some of this stock. I know of widows who were induced to buy $5,000 worth of stock in a power company and it has practically no value now.

Mr. MAY. Will you let me ask you a question right there?

Senator BONE. Yes.

Mr. MAY. In view of that outrageous and unjustifiable abuse of the power company in selling a widow that $5,000 worth of stock, do you think that the Government of the United States ought to become a party to that transaction and destroy that stock for her?

Senator BONE. I answered that by making another assertion; that is, I know of no instance where the Government of the United States has stepped in and prevented the chain-store combine from ruining all the individual business men of a community. Do you know of any instance of that kind?

Mr. MAY. No; and I am opposed to chain stores, too.

Senator BONE. I frankly confess to you I cannot understand why all our solicitude shall be for the power companies and not for other forms of business. For years I have represented many different forms of business, but I have never found any of this tender solicitude expressed in many quarters for any outfit except the power companies.

Mr. MAY. Have you ever heard of the railroads, as well as insurance companies, having stock securities all over the country—and they are about to go broke—and the Reconstruction Finance Corporation lending them millions and hundreds of millions to protect those investments?

Senator BONE. That is right, and we have done it. But the power companies have been granted special privileges. There has been incorporated into our laws those things known as "certificates of necessity and convenience", acts which gave them absolute monopolies which are, in my judgment, contrary to the very spirit of our people. Private monopoly is indefensible.

Mr. MAY. I believe that some of them ought to be indicted and prosecuted. That is all, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. KVALE—

Mr. KVALE. Senator, when you referred in your statement to the power companies some years ago paying taxes upon a valuation of $300,000,000; what did they base those figures on? Is that the value of their securities?

Senator BONE. No. They did not base it on anything except that upon which most of their statements are based, and that is a figment of the imagination; anything that will capture public imagination and can be utilized as an argument for their purposes.

Mr. KVALE. The reason I ask the question is because I tried to adduce similar testimony at the time the power executives from Alabama and Georgia were on the stand. I tried to get specific comparisons of definite property sites and locations on the one hand for taxing purposes and on the other hand for the purpose of issuing securities and for rate-making purposes.

Senator BONE. Were you successful?

Mr. KVALE. Not at all.

Senator BONE. And you will not be.

Mr. KVALE. I wondered if you could add anything for the record in that regard?

Senator BONE. I am sorry, Congressman; I cannot with respect to the Alabama companies. I am not familiar with their set-up.

Mr. KVALE. In the State of Washington you must know of some county or some locality where they placed a certain valuation upon properties and the customers of that company paid rates on that basis, and on that basis securities were issued, but when it came to the State or county taxing agency making an appraisal, and levying taxes thereon, I think you would be able to say to the committee that the discrepancy between those two sets of figures would be astounding, even to members who think they are informed.

Senator BONE. Let me give the committee one illustration of that. We will write this right into the record, so that you can check against it if you desire.

A year or so ago the city of Puyallup, near Tacoma, hired my good friend Mr. Murray as its attorney to condemn the distribution system of the Puget Sound Power & Light Co. in that city, with a view of taking it over and buying power from my own city of Tacoma.

In the trial of that action witnesses on behalf of the company testified that its distribution system in that city was worth $450,000 and they were earning a very nice return, a very handsome return, on that value of $450,000. Now, here is a concrete case. It is a concrete example of the thing Congressman KVALE refers to.

The vice president of Puget Sound Power & Light Co., a gentleman by the name of McGrath, went on the witness stand. I happened to be in court at the time he was testifying, and he swore that the system was worth $450,000, and his engineers supported that testimony.

I wanted to know what taxes they were paying on this $450,000 system, so I went to the assessor's office and found that it was paying taxes on a value of $15,000, which was exactly one thirtieth of the value that the officers of that company were giving to it in sworn testimony.

That thing is true not only in Washington, it is true everywhere; and the unhappy picture presented by the tax evasion of power companies in my State is duplicated in every State in this Union.

Mr. MONTET. What value was placed on that in the condemnation proceeding?

Senator BONE. The jury gave the company $216,000 for the system.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Chairman, I have finished, except that I would like to add this, in connection with this controversy, that we have urged protection of the victims of these fake stocks, that the Government should undertake to guarantee those either at their par value or their market value as of a certain date. If that were done, would not the Government, in effect, as has been suggested, actually be in the position of underwriting and fostering and nurturing that sort of criminal practice?

Senator BONE. I cannot conceive of a Congress, a body of men representing a civilized Nation, validating all the fakery and all the fraud of the past.

Again I want to say to you, Congressman, that if there is any man in this room or in this country who is sorry that somebody must pay the price for all this sort of thing, because ultimately they are going to have to pay it, I am that man. I am sorry the people are going to lose money in these things. But they are going to lose money, not because there are men like myself in this country who want public ownership of power, but they are going to lose it because the very system in which they invested is financially unhealthy and cannot survive. The practices of the power companies in this country have been un-American. These practices have hammered at the very foundation stones of this Republic. In my judgment, they have done things that were unconscionable, and unfortunately the people will have to pay the price, whether you or I act or not as Members of this Congress.

Many power combines are now in receiverships and their little stockholders will be washed out. A little bunch of bondholders will ultimately own these systems. Again I call attention to Foshay and Insull.

Whether we go ahead with this Muscle Shoals development or not, private power companies cannot continue to pay interest and dividends on the huge flotations of bonds and stocks they have outstanding.

It may be that the passage of the Muscle Shoals bill would merely hasten that result, Congressman. But if it does there is nothing morally wrong in that. This thing is going to happen with a lot of companies in time, because most of them have indulged in that practice.

That is why Congress faces the necessity of passing laws to get at these situations.

Mr. MONTET. May I ask the witness another question? I am sure that there is not a member on this committee or a Member of Congress who believes in or who supports this practice of issuing fictitious issues of stock in any corporation or in any business. For myself I am just trying to get your general attitude in connection with such matters. Do you not know that when it comes to fictitious stocks that the railroads of this country have probably sold their share of that kind of stock? Do you not think so?

Senator BONE. Oh, there have been so many abuses in our economic system that I am sure you can appreciate my reluctance in expressing conclusions on all of those things. They present unhappy pictures. You have asked me about the railroad companies—

Mr. MONTET. Do you not know that that is a fact?

Senator BONE. Yes; that is true. But let us go back. The Government of the United States, represented by its Congress, gave the men who built the Union Pacific Railroad Co. enough money out of the Public Treasury to build that road. They gave Uncle Sam a second mortgage. You remember that?

Mr. MONTET. Yes.

Senator BONE. Uncle Sam should have had a first mortgage—as a matter of fact, he should have built and kept the road.

Mr. MAY. Always.

Senator BONE. Yes; men loyal to this Government would have insisted on at least a first mortgage instead of a second mortgage, which was given, so that a bunch of manipulators could not go out and flood Europe with a lot of fake bonds that brought disaster to everybody and that resulted in a great scandal.

Mr. MONTET. Do you think it is proper for this Government to come to the rescue of the railroads, as it has through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation?

Senator BONE. Of course, transportation is such a vital thing that—

Mr. MONTET. It is no more vital than power, is it?

Senator BONE. That is true; power, transportation, communication—those things are so vital to the people that to allow them to remain in private hands without any effective control over those agencies, and to allow these men to flood this country with billions of dollars worth of trash, which investors buy on the strength of assertions of such men as Mr. Insull, who held themselves out as public servants—to allow that is a reproach to our people and a reproach to this Government.

These are some of the things that breed contempt for and a fear of government, and a contempt for parliamentary government, if you please.

That is one of the reasons why, in Germany today, we are witnessing a sad and somber thing—the breakdown of parliamentary government—people feeling to an autocracy because they feel that parliamentary government has broken down, is not functioning on behalf of the people.

We do not want that sort of thing to come about in this country.

Mr. MONTET. I do not want you to get away from my question, Senator, whether or not you approve of the Government coming to the rescue of the railroads, as it has in the last year or two, through the operations of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation?

Senator BONE. Well, I was not in Congress to vote on it.

Mr. MONTET. I am just asking whether you approve that or not.

Senator BONE. You are asking me to approve in a blanket sort of way, a law; I might approve some portion of it and not approve all of it.

Mr. MONTET. Do you approve of the principle of the Government going to their rescue?

Senator BONE. I believe this: If the Government comes to the rescue of one of those organizations, it should fortify itself with a first-mortgage lien on it so that, if it has to, it can take it over and write out all of this fictitious value, and then go ahead with operations under public ownership.

Mr. MONTET. Are you going to leave the impression with the committee that you have no opinion on the particular proposition that I have submitted to you?

Senator BONE. I think the Government in a great crisis probably would have to support many of those institutions, and could do it very legitimately.

Mr. MONTET. Do you approve of the support of the railroads by the Government?

Senator BONE. I think it were better to do this than to have the railroads absolutely crash—that is, better to support them in the crisis.

Mr. MONTET. In spite of the fact that it is well known and has been well known for many decades that if there are any institutions in this country that are loaded down with watered stock, it is the railroads.

Senator BONE. They have been grave offenders in the past, but they were tyros, kids, kindergarten operators, compared with the power companies.

Mr. MONTET. It may be because of the fact that the power companies' activities are fresher in the public's mind.

Senator BONE. No; it is true that the railroads have written into the capital structure of their companies lots of wind and water in times past and have never amortized it, and have staggered along year after year trying to pay interest and dividends on that which should have been written out long ago. That is the hard and fast price of private ownership of a utility.

Public ownership does a thing which must appeal to every lawyer, to every thinking man; it writes out the capital cost of a system. It eliminates the problem that presents itself to you now, "What shall we do with this stock?" Do you not see that? We write that problem out with public ownership—write it out for all time.

Mr. MONTET. What are we going to do with all this railroad stock?

Senator BONE. I confess that these abuses have been with us long enough and the time has come when they present a very terrifying problem to the Government. That problem is confronting us today, and therefore what I might feel is a logical step to take, I might be compelled to abandon temporarily in the face of a great crisis, and for the moment do something that might not seem really logical. The financial blunders of the past are exacting a bitter price.

In a great crisis I am not going to indulge in a lot of niceties; I am going to try to save the structure from collapsing, if I can, and I am going to concede a lot of things. I am willing to abandon a lot of things that appeal to me in order, for the moment, to buttress and bolster this thing and keep it from collapsing.

But that is not going to prevent for one moment my drive for the ultimate solution of this problem along logical lines. Intellectual honesty dictates that course.

I think the answer to this does not lie in allowing these private companies to continue their abuses. I may temporarily support them, on the one hand, to prevent a total collapse; but, on the other hand, set about, as I believe we should, to prevent a recurrence of these abuses in the future.

Mr. MONTET. Senator, do you subscribe to the principle of chain-store operation?

The CHAIRMAN. Gentlemen, if you will pardon me, we have one problem that is confronting us, and though we would like to allow a great deal of latitude, I think it would be the will of the committee that we do not continue with a purely academic discussion.

Mr. MONTET. Mr. Chairman, perhaps you do not appreciate the analogy between railroads and chain-store operation, but I do.

The CHAIRMAN. Let us proceed, then.

Senator BONE. May I answer that by saying this: I think I referred to chain stores a moment ago.

Mr. MONTET. And that is the reason I am bringing it up now.

Senator BONE. I say, I know of no other Government agency that has ever been used or invoked to protect the little business man from the encroachment of the chain stores. As a result of present economic forces, some half million individual business men have gone down and out in this country in a comparatively short space of time. Antitrust statutes appear futile.

Mr. MONTET. That is true.

Senator BONE. The competition of the chain store has made it impossible for the little fellow to survive. The Government has not attempted to protect the little business man from the encroachments of the big combinations. That is why I do not see why there should be so much concern over protecting the power companies. They are now being merged into the most gigantic trust on earth.

Mr. THOMPSON. Do you favor Government ownership of railroads, telephone, and telegraph lines?

Senator BONE. I think we are going to have to come to it.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, may I ask one question right on this issue here?

The CHAIRMAN. Very well.

Mr. MAY. Senator, according to the proof submitted by the power company representatives in behalf of the Alabama Power Co., as I remember it, they are serving 384 communities in Alabama, embracing about 640,000 square miles, and giving an average domestic consumers' rate of 1.23 cents per kilowatt-hour.

Mr. KVALE. That is not the average domestic rate.

Senator BONE. The average domestic rate is over 4 cents, according to figures in my possession.

Mr. MAY. I thought that was the domestic rate.

Senator BONE. Oh, no.

Mr. KVALE. That is the over-all rate.

Mr. MAY. Assuming, then, that it is an average over all, do you think with the present development that that is probably a reasonably fair rate for efficient service or not?

Senator BONE. In the first place—

Mr. MAY. For that many communities?

Senator BONE. In the first place, I want to deny most emphatically that they are giving that kind of a domestic rate of an average of a little over 1 cent. If they assert that, I would want to see the figures. I have in my files the findings of the last organization meeting of the public utilities commissions of the United States, and the average domestic rate is over 4 cents.

Mr. RANSLEY. That is an average rate over all.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Chairman, the manager of the company to which I have referred promised that he would try to insert in the record the average and also the percentage of each class of consumer power. Do you recall that?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir; and I believe he will. I have no doubt that he will comply with that promise. It has not come in yet, so far as I know.

Senator, I wanted to state in your presence that the Honorable MILES ALLGOOD, a Representative from the State of Alabama, who has long been a very loyal supporter of the proposition of the operation of the Muscle Shoals properties in the interest of the people, has just handed me a telegram signed by some 9 or 10 people, from Albertville, Ala., and the telegram reads as follows:

ALBERTVILLE, ALA., April 14, 1933.

HON. MILES C. ALLGOOD,

House of Representatives:

Regardless Alabama Power Co. clandestine propaganda, people of this section, and we believe 90 percent throughout the State, are whole-heartedly in favor of Roosevelt's Muscle Shoals development, including the building of transmission lines.

Thos. E. Orr, A. B. Hooper, Jr., J. Pat Colvin, J. W. Walker, W. S. Hewitt, R. E. Dunson, E. L. Roberts, B. C. Scarborough, C. J. Walker, Hogan Jackson, I. C. Hubbard, L. S. Thompson, C. W. Long, T. D. Thompson, G. D. Wells, First National Bank, M. F. Irvin, Joe C. Wakefield.

That is a voice from Alabama.

Mr. JUDSON KING. Mr. Chairman, may I make one statement to Mr. May?

The CHAIRMAN. Very well.

Mr. KING. Mr. May, if you are under the impression that you are quoting a document of the New York Power Authority there—and that is what you told the committee—you are quite mistaken. That document that you have was a document of the development commission. The impression is, as you gave it, that that was by the New York Power Authority, and that this is Governor Roosevelt's proposition. That is not true. The men who made this report failed of appointment by Governor Roosevelt on the New York Power Authority, which is now headed by Frank P. Walsh.

Senator BONE. Mr. Chairman, may I make one further statement? A member of the press has asked me about my reference to Mr. Charles Francis Adams. Let me say that in December 1929, when this controversy over the Lexington coming to Tacoma was before us, I had occasion to wire Senator DILL, and at that time I examined Moody's Manual and other statistical works in order to determine the connection of Mr. Adams with the Puget Sound Power & Light Co. and other Stone & Webster organizations. Those manuals showed that Mr. Adams was a director in practically all of the Stone & Webster power companies scattered all over the United States. It was later announced that Mr. Adams had severed his connection with them. Whether he retained any stock interest is not apparent from this record. But it was a fact that Mr. Adams, while Secretary of the Navy, made it possible for the Puget Sound Power & Light Co. to utilize the great Government steam plant at Bremerton Navy Yard to carry it through this power shortage in the winter of 1929.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you, Senator.

On page 2, beginning with line 12, it is proposed to strike out "For personal services, $38,794, plus so much as may be necessary to compensate the Engineer Commissioner at such rate in grade 8 of the professional and scientific service of the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, as may be determined by the Board of Commissioners" and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. On behalf of the committee, I am instructed to offer a second amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 80, after line 83, it is proposed to insert a new section, as follows:

SEC. 7. When specifically recommended by the budget officer of the District of Columbia and approved by the Commissioners of said District, transfers may be made between subheads of appropriations provided in this act for the free Public Library, public playgrounds, public schools (except buildings and grounds and repairs to buildings), health department, and public welfare, respectively: Provided, That such transfers under this section shall not be made between appropriations for the several municipal services named, and all transfers, whether approved or contemplated, shall be reported to Congress in the estimates of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year 1935.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, on behalf of the committee I am authorized to offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, awhile ago I sent to the desk an amendment which I ask to have stated at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Michigan offers an amendment, which will be stated.

Mr. COUZENS. While the messenger is getting it I will explain the amendment.

On page 8, I move to strike out the following words on line 14:

Installation and modification of electric traffic lights, signals, and controls.

And then, on line 18, I move to strike out the sum of "$45,000" and make it "$10,000."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, the city has gone completely crazy in putting in these electric-light signals. Not only is that the case here in the District but it is spreading all over the Nation. Every village and hamlet is being plastered with these automatic electric signs. In other words, motorists are being taught to rely on signs instead of their brains, and street corners that have been without these signal lights for years are now being plastered all over with a lot of automatic signal lights. From my observation I think the District of Columbia is entirely surfeited with lights of that sort, and I want them stopped.

That is the purpose of the amendment. I do not object to the other part of the section.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, this matter was not brought before the committee. However, the amendment, if adopted, will reduce the appropriation by the sum of $35,000. Inasmuch as the Budget is in its present condition, and inasmuch as this matter was not considered by the committee, I have no objection to the amendment going to conference.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, on yesterday I gave notice that it was my intention to offer to this bill an amendment which was sent to the desk and printed. That amendment is intended to be supplementary to the bill which was passed by the Senate with reference to the hours of work.

The original bill passed by the Senate prohibited the shipment in interstate commerce of commodities manufactured in establishments where the employees work more than 5 days in any week, or more than 6 hours in any day. Of course, if we are going to establish a normal working week, we should establish it as nearly universally throughout the country as we can. For that reason, it is my thought that the bill which we passed should be supplemented by providing that the Government itself shall not buy articles or commodities from factories in which the workers are employed more than 5 days per week or 6 hours per day, and that contractors should not purchase, for use in Government buildings, goods that have been manufactured in factories working more than the prescribed time.

This matter was particularly called to my attention by reason of a letter which I received 3 days ago. A man wrote me that he was employed in a factory manufacturing articles for use by the Government at Boulder Dam, and that the employees of that factory are working 13 hours per day, 7 days per week, in a city where 30 percent of the population is being fed today by the Federal Government!

In other words, in that city the Government is buying articles manufactured by men working 13 hours a day, 7 days per week, and at the same time the Government is digging down into the Treasury and feeding more than 30 percent of the population! The same thing is true with reference to a great many other cities.

Mr. President, it is my intention to call this amendment first to the attention of the House Committee on Labor, which is considering the bill which the Senate passed. I have reason to believe that the committee will probably report out the bill about next Monday; at least, that is the information which has been given out. I hope to present this matter to them, in order that it may be considered by them as a supplement to the original bill. I wish it distinctly understood that, insofar as I am concerned, I do not believe any program passed at this extra session of Congress which fails to provide for putting people to work will relieve the situation. I do not believe any program will be adequate which fails to recognize the fact that in order to put people to work there must be some kind of a regulation of the hours of labor. I believe that if that is ignored, we cannot put back to work any reasonable proportion of the 13,000,000 unemployed.

Therefore, if by reason of lack of opportunity or time, the House does not act upon the bill which the Senate passed, it is my intention to offer at a later date, on some bill that the House has acted upon, the 30 hour bill with or without these amendments, as the Senate may determine.

With this statement, I desire to say that I shall not offer the amendment to this particular bill, with the hope that it may be adopted in the House.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the engrossment of the amendments and the third reading of the bill.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I move that the Senate insist on its amendments, request a conference with the House of Representatives upon the bill and amendments, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Oklahoma.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma, Mr. GLASS, Mr. KING, Mr. NYE, and Mr. KEYES conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter from Mr. William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, relating to the amendment at pages 30 and 31 of the bill; also, a letter from Mr. Green relating to the amendment just adopted, appearing at page 44 of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letters are as follows:

WASHINGTON, D.C., May 1, 1933.

Hon. SAM G. BRATTON,

Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: The appropriation bill for the District of Columbia, as reported to the Senate, contains an amendment on page 31 authorizing the appointment of "qualified temporary teachers, notwithstanding the eligible list." The word "qualified" obviously has little meaning if the statute destroys the eligibility requirements for teachers. The amendment would, in practice, subject the children of the public schools of Washington to the care of less qualified teachers than they could have were this amendment not enacted.

The amendment further provides that in filling vacancies in the system, teachers now in the system shall have the preference "so far as practicable." This provision would permit the appointment of new teachers possessing less than the legal eligibility requirements in place of retaining in the system legally qualified teachers when such changes would appear to be more practicable. I do not at this time raise the objection to the appointment of temporary teachers, as I am cognizant of the fact that the appointment of a temporary teacher saves the Government some money, as the temporary teacher cannot be paid longevity for teaching service before his appointment to the local system. However, if temporary teachers were appointed from the eligible list the saving would likewise be effected, and the children of Washington would have the privilege of being taught by highly qualified teachers. To correct the situation this provision would effect, the following amendment will be offered from the floor. Page 31, lines 5, 6, 7, to be changed to read as follows:

"The fiscal year 1934 appoint as temporary teachers in the public schools of the District of Columbia, qualified teachers from the eligible list."

Line 10, strike out the words "so far as practicable."

That the Senate would needlessly and ruthlessly seek to destroy the standards of teaching in the schools of the Nation's Capital as the proposed amendment would do, is, to labor, unthinkable.

I trust that we may have your active support for these suggested changes to be offered to this bill when it is up before the Senate for consideration.

Very truly yours,

WM. GREEN,

President American Federation of Labor.

WASHINGTON, D.C., May 1, 1933.

Hon. SAMUEL BRATTON,

United States Senate, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR SENATOR BRATTON: The amendment which you plan to introduce to the District of Columbia appropriations bill, which provides that the fire fighters of the District of Columbia may become members of the International Association of Fire Fighters, meets with the hearty approval of the officers and members of the American Federation of Labor. The American Federation of Labor holds that every worker, whether employed by the Government or in private industry, should be permitted to exercise the right to unite and organize for mutual helpfulness and for the purpose of improving their social, economic, and industrial status. We regard the exercise of the right of all working people to organize as a vital, cardinal right which should not be interfered with.

The amendment which I understand you propose to offer reads as follows:

"Provided, however, That no officer or member of the fire department of the District of Columbia, payment for whose services shall be made from this or any other appropriation made for like purposes, shall be prohibited from becoming or being a member of any organization so long as such organization does not permit, claim, hold, or use the strike for any purpose whatsoever, notwithstanding anything heretofore to the contrary."

Such an amendment serves two very distinct and definite purposes. First, it guarantees the right of employees of the fire department of the District of Columbia to organize if they wish to do so. Second, it amply protects the District of Columbia against interruption in service and eliminates the threat of a resort to strike as a means of settling any dispute over wages or conditions of employment which may arise. Surely, with such ample protection and with such established guaranties there can be no objection on the part of Congress or of the people to the exercise of the right of the firemen of the District of Columbia to organize for mutual self-helpfulness.

I trust that you and the Members of the Congress will share with me this point of view. I strongly urge the adoption of the amendment herein referred to.

Very sincerely yours,

WM. GREEN,
President American Federation of Labor.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

The VICE PRESIDENT. Reports of committees are in order.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. From the Committee on Foreign Relations I submit reports on five nominations and ask that they may go to the calendar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The nominations will be received and placed on the Executive Calendar.

FEDERAL FARM BOARD

Mr. SMITH. From the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry I report back favorably the nomination of Francis Winfred Peck, of Minnesota, to be a member of the Federal Farm Board for the unexpired portion of the term of 6 years from June 15, 1930. On account of unavoidable delay this nomination has not been reported before and Mr. Morgenthau has asked that, if possible, it be considered this evening.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the nomination just reported by the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. McNARY. Has the nomination been referred to the committee?

Mr. SMITH. It has. The Senator from Oregon concurred in it.

Mr. McNARY. It is not on the calendar, is it?

Mr. SMITH. It is not. It is to fill out an unexpired term. I did not have a chance to call the committee together, and I frankly say that they were polled, and they were practically unanimous. As I stated, Mr. Morgenthau has asked that action be taken at this time on account of the pressure of business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from South Carolina for immediate consideration? The Chair hears none, and, without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

INTERIOR DEPARTMENT

Mr. KENDRICK. From the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys I report back favorably the nomination of Oscar L. Chapman, of Colorado, to be Assistant Secretary of the Interior, vice John H. Edwards. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the nomination.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Wyoming for immediate consideration? The Chair hears none, and, without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

BOARD OF TAX APPEALS

Mr. HARRISON. The nomination of Jed C. Adams, of Texas, to be a member of the Board of Tax Appeals for the unexpired portion of a term of 12 years from June 2, 1932, was favorably reported earlier in the day, as in executive session. I should like to have it considered at this time.

Mr. COUZENS. That nomination ought to go over. It is not on the calendar.

Mr. HARRISON subsequently said: Mr. President, I hope there will be no objection to my request for unanimous consent for the confirmation of the nomination of Mr. Adams.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] asked that it go over.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not think he has any objection.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, I understood that that nomination was reported from the Committee on Finance. I did not recall, and I do not now recall, that it was taken up in the committee meeting this morning. I have since been informed that the committee was polled, although I was not polled. I should like to have some information as to who the gentleman is and what the office is.

Mr. HARRISON. The nomination is for membership on the Board of Tax Appeals. A member of the Board died the other day, and this nomination is to fill the vacancy. I may say that the gentleman is from Texas and is quite a good friend of the Vice President.

Mr. CONNALLY. If the Senator from Michigan desires any information about the nominee, I shall be glad to give it to him.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the nomination? The Chair hears none; and, without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

GREAT LAKES-ST. LAWRENCE DEEP WATERWAY TREATY—MINORITY VIEWS (PT. 2, EX. REPT. NO. 1)

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, on behalf of the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], who is unavoidably detained from the Senate on account of illness, I ask leave to submit the views of the minority of the Committee on Foreign Relations on the St. Lawrence deep waterway treaty, and ask that they may be printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the minority views will be received and printed.

Are there further reports of committees? If not, the calendar is in order.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOR

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of Charles Wyzanski, Jr., of Massachusetts, to be Solicitor of Labor, vice Theodore G. Risley.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this nomination be recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Nevada? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

DEPARTMENT OF THE TREASURY

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of J. F. T. O'Connor, of California, to be Comptroller of the Currency, to fill an existing vacancy.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, this nomination has just reached the calendar. Several Members have stated to me that they would like further time to consider the qualifications of the nominee. For that reason I ask that it may go over today.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, can we not fix a definite time for action on this nomination? It is a very important one.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I assure the Senator that there will be no purpose to delay consideration, but I could not specify a date at this time.

Mr. HARRISON. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The nomination will go over.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of James Crawford Biggs, of North Carolina, to be Solicitor General, vice Thomas D. Thacher.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

RECESS

The Senate resumed legislative session.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 45 minutes p.m.) the Senate took a recess until tomorrow, Thursday, May 4, 1933, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, MAY 3, 1933

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Our Lord and our God, in these silent moments dedicated to prayer, enable us to listen to the voice of our deepest natures and know that the vast reward of a godly life is in the soul itself. Here we attain the gladness and freedom of duty, and work and sacrifice accomplish their best. In our intercourse with one another in this Chamber may we proceed on the grounds of mutual faith and hope, forgetting ourselves in the largest service we owe our beloved country. Oh, cast Thy peace into the tumultuous life of this present day. Overarch our restlessness with calm, and in the thought of the eternal may we find guidance and wisdom in the pressing problems of these hours. Through Christ our Savior. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

FARM RELIEF

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to House Resolution 124. Under the rule the previous question is ordered.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, on this resolution I should like a division of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will indicate the division desired.

Mr. SNELL. I would request a division as follows:

The part of the resolution down to and including the language "numbered 1 to 84, inclusive, be, and the same are hereby, disagreed to" will be one proposition, and the language "that Senate amendment numbered 85 be, and the same is hereby, concurred in" will be the second proposition.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution the bill H.R. 3835, with Senate amendments thereto, be, and the same is hereby, taken from the Speaker's table; that all points of order against said bill or Senate amendments thereto shall be considered as waived; that Senate amendments numbered 1 to 84, inclusive, be, and the same are hereby, disagreed to.

The question was taken; and the first part of the resolution was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the remaining part of the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

House Resolution 102

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution clause 6 of rule XVI be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows: "On the demand of any Member, before the question is put, a question shall be divided if it includes propositions so distinct in substance that one being taken away a substantive proposition shall remain: Provided, That any motion or resolution to elect members or any portion of the members of the standing committees of the House, and the joint standing committees shall not be divisible, nor shall any resolution or order reported by the Committee on Rules, providing a special order of business, be divisible."

Mr. POUL. Mr. Speaker, I yield one half of the hour to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANSLEY]. I do not know whether this side will take half an hour or not. I yield myself 10 minutes.

Mr. Speaker, what this resolution accomplishes may be stated in a very few words. It prevents the division of a report from the Committee on Rules.

According to my recollection, until some 20 years ago it was very seldom the practice of the House to divide a report from the Committee on Rules. Beginning with the administration of Speaker Henderson and continuing through administrations that followed, the practice has grown. I believe it is contrary to good procedure and takes unnecessary time.

Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Rules fixes the program of the House, within certain limits of course. It has frequently been called the political committee of the House, and I submit to the membership on both sides of the House that whether one party is in power or whether another party is in power, a report from the Committee on Rules fixing the order of business ought not to be divisible, and that is all this resolution does.

The Committee on Rules makes a report and proposes a certain order of business. Somebody discovers that it may include two substantive propositions, and the result is two roll calls are required.

We have seen the political pendulum swing very far both ways. It has gone quite far your way and quite far our way. I submit to the membership of this House that in the interest of orderly procedure—and God knows I am not merely seeking more power for the Committee on Rules, a thing I have never done since I have served on the committee—but I do submit regardless of which party is in power that the order of business reported by the Committee on Rules ought not to be subjected to division, and that is all this rule does.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POUL. I yield.

Mr. SNELL. I have never found any fault with the Committee on Rules, whether I was in the majority or the minority. I am willing to submit to it in the small minority; but the gentleman must admit that the change he proposes does to a certain extent infringe the rights of every individual Member.

Mr. POUL. I say it ought to be done whether my party is in power or your party is in power.

Mr. SNELL. I will not argue that with the gentleman, but I should like to ask him this question. Is this in accordance with the statement made by the Democrats at the beginning of the Seventy-second Congress, when you told the House how liberal the Democratic Party was going to be in protecting the rights of Members?

Mr. POUL. I think it is in accordance with that statement. I do not think there is any inconsistency in it. This takes away no power so far as the individual Member is concerned, except he cannot ask for a separate vote. It does curtail the power of the individual Member to that extent. I submit to my beloved friend from New York—and I emphasize the word "beloved" because he knows that for him personally I have genuine affection—that in our efforts here to blaze the roadway to a new and better day it is a little out of place to be always injecting politics. I submit that the country is not in a mood to tolerate very much longer the repeated injection of politics, when the membership on both sides of the aisle is trying to cooperate and travel along a pathway that will bring us into the sunlight of prosperity.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POUL. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. Simply to say that I as an individual or the Republican Party as a whole have never made a campaign before the people against the rules of the House, while the Democrats have made the liberalization of the rules as a campaign issue, and when you turn directly around I think I have the right in a general way to call the attention of the country to how you have changed your position when placed in the majority.

Mr. POUL. Mr. Speaker, my friend has stated his position, and I have stated what I believe to be the position of the majority. We are doing what we believe is necessary to assist in carrying out a great program for the rehabilitation of this Nation, and I believe, as I said in the beginning, that the resolution that has been reported will make for orderly procedure and will not curtail the legislative liberty of the individual Member. I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH].

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, the practice has obtained here in this House from the very beginning, with reference to reports from the Committee on Rules, as well as the reports from any other committee, to call for a division of a subject containing several propositions not interrelated. The purpose of that practice was most graphically illustrated a few moments ago when, upon the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL], House Resolution 124 was divided and the two separate and distinct propositions contained therein were voted upon separately. That has been the practice of this House from the very beginning. That resolution contained two distinct propositions. One proposition was to disagree to and send to conference 84 amendments of the Senate dealing with the farm-relief portion of the bill in question. The other proposition was to agree to amendment no. 85, which was the provision looking to the inflation of our currency—two absolutely separate propositions. A Member might support one and not the other, and in accordance with the wise rules of the House any Member had the right up to the time when we pass this resolution to demand such a division. It is the greatest protection of the individual Member and the greatest protection of the minority in our rules at the present time. What wrong is there about a man who wants to further farm relief amendments of the Senate having the right to vote "yes" on them, and if he is not in sympathy with the inflation provisions, having the right to vote "no" on them?

But under this proposition, if he wants to help the farm provisions along on the one hand, he has also to vote for a subject that has nothing to do with it, and about which he has a different opinion from the proponents of the resolution. Why is it not right to divide these questions, including resolutions coming from the Committee on Rules? The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POUL] said that "recently" the practice had sprung up of embracing in the divisibility rule resolutions reported by the Committee on Rules. I do not believe the gentleman can find a precedent in the entire history of the House but that says that a rule is just as divisible as any other proposition brought up for consideration of the Membership of the House. For that reason I say that this is putting a yoke, tying a collar around the necks of the individual Members, something which has never before been attempted in the history of the House. This goes away beyond any gag rule. No matter how gagging a rule may be brought in here by the Committee on Rules, if it contains separate propositions, we should have the right to vote separately upon them, and this proposition takes the last vestige of independence from us. It is thoroughly vicious, it is drastic, it is taking from the Membership of the House the last right to give expression to their views, and to voice here the opinions and views of the constituents they represent.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS].

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I hope this resolution will be adopted. It seems to me, as was said by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU], it is necessary in the interest of the proper procedure of the House. I understand, as gentlemen understand, that these rules are reported with reference to bills pending before the Committee on Rules, with a certain plan of procedure, and I can well understand, where one proposition is voted out and others left in it might result in confusion and destroy the whole purpose of the rule. It seems to me this report made by the Committee on Rules providing that there shall be no division with reference to any report made by that standing committee is not only wise but necessary in order to carry out its recommendation to the House. After all, when the rule comes before the House, it is a question with the House as to whether or not it will be willing to adopt it or change it. I repeat, I can plainly see where in some cases occasion may arise when some portion of the rule will be stricken out and leave in some provision without any reference to what may have been done or may come after.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. Yes.

Mr. McFARLANE. What is the necessity for the change at this time? Tell us what you have in mind?

Mr. BYRNS. I have nothing in mind except, as I stated, that I believe it is necessary to proper procedure in this House, and I agree with the gentleman from North Carolina that I think it ought to be adopted without reference to politics, no matter what party is in power, because, as I said a moment ago, I can see the possibility when a rule is presented here and when a motion is made for a division that the House might strike out some provision in the rule reported which would destroy the purpose of the rule and without which the rule would not have been reported. I therefore think that in the interest of good procedure this resolution should be adopted.

Mr. WARREN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. I yield.

Mr. WARREN. Did not exactly that same thing occur in the economy bill last May?

Mr. BYRNS. Exactly. It is to avoid just such a situation as occurred in that bill that this is being done.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. I yield.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. This rule was reported about 20 days ago. Why was it held until just before this appropriation bill came up? Is there any significance in that?

Mr. BYRNS. I do not think there is any particular reason for that. It has been on the calendar for that time and could be called up at any time. I do know that in face of the fact that the gentleman from New York asked for a division a moment ago the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] refrained from proposing it in order to permit you to have that division. So there was no purpose in holding it back until this time. The gentleman knows there have come from his committee many rules which have been held on the calendar for a considerable length of time before they were taken up for consideration.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. I yield.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Would the gentleman mind if we put on an amendment providing that no Chairman of the Committee on Rules should be allowed to carry a rule in his pocket for twenty-odd days? Would the gentleman be willing to have that amendment incorporated in this resolution?

Mr. BYRNS. Well, I do not exactly understand the query of the gentleman.

Mr. POU. Under the rules now that cannot be done.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. This very rule we are now discussing has been carried around by the chairman in his pocket for the Lord knows how many weeks, and only when an emergency arose was it necessary to bring it in, when you got afraid of your own Members running away with your proposition and you wanted to ram it down their throats and prevent them from voicing their protests.

Mr. BYRNS. It has been on the calendar and not in the pocket of the chairman. Now, let us be frank about the matter. The President has recommended as an amendment to the appropriation bill certain legislation. It is coming before this House. It is not a political matter, but it is in the interest of economy. The purpose of the gentleman's party is to demand a division and possibly defeat some of that legislation.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. In the depth of his heart the gentleman knows it is a political proposition.

Mr. BYRNS. I know nothing of the sort.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. With a two-thirds majority in this House, you are trying to jam this gag rule down Democratic throats, and it is an outrage on them, as well as on us Republicans, who do not like gag rules.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BACON].

Mr. BACON. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to this rule. There have been two very illuminating discussions of the reasons for this rule, and both of those discussions were made by leading Democrats. In the Seventy-second Congress, Mr. CANNON of Missouri discussed at length the reasons for this rule at the time he invoked it. He pointed out that the reason for the rule was the protection of the minority. At one place the gentleman said:

It is a right which has come down to us from the First Congress, and when properly invoked has never been denied from that time to this.

Speaker Garner sustained Mr. CANNON's question for a division and overruled a point of order made against it.

In the very able and liberal discussion of the rule which Mr. CANNON made on April 27, 1932, he referred to a previous occasion when this rule was discussed. Mr. Fitzgerald, Democratic Chairman of the Appropriations Committee, asked for the division of a rule that was prepared by Mr. Cannon, the Speaker, who was also a member of the Rules Committee, with Mr. Dalzell, and Mr. John Sharp Williams, the only minority member. Mr. Fitzgerald again pointed out that this rule was in the interests of the protection of the minority.

"Under this rule", he said, "which the Committee on Rules has not yet abrogated, a Member of the House is entitled to demand, before the question is put, that a separate vote be taken upon each substantive proposition in this resolution. Since the majority has exercised the power under the rules of the House to strip the minority of all its rights, some of the minority will insist upon the few rights that are still left under the rules for the rest of this session." [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

I do not hear any Democratic applause today.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. BACON. Gladly.

Mr. LEHLBACH. And that was in 1908?

Mr. BACON. That was in 1908.

Mr. LEHLBACH. When Speaker Cannon was vested with all the powers that the Speakers in those times exercised, when he was known throughout the country as a czar, and when he and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. Dalzell, ruled this House with an iron hand, and yet "Czar" Cannon and Dalzell would not take from the minority the right to divide a rule coming from the Committee on Rules?

Mr. BACON. That was also carefully pointed out by Mr. CANNON in 1932, in discussing the fight that Mr. Fitzgerald made for the rights of the minority when he said:

In this connection it may be recalled that the Committee on Rules at that time consisted of but three members—Mr. Dalzell, of Pennsylvania; Mr. Speaker Cannon, of Illinois; and Mr. John Sharp Williams, of Mississippi. Speaker Cannon was at that time at the zenith of his power. His control of the legislative program of the House was absolute and undisputed. He was referred to in every newspaper as "the czar."

He had personally supervised the drafting of this rule. But when Mr. Fitzgerald demanded a separate vote on 1 of the 5 propositions carried by the rule the request was so obviously within his rights under the section of the rules of the House which the Speaker had just read that, although it was vigorously objected to by Mr. Dalzell and other parliamentarians on the majority side, Speaker Cannon held that he was entitled to a separate vote upon that one clause, and put the question.

As one member of the minority, I protest once more at the gag which the majority is placing upon the minority. They are changing a rule that is as old as Congress, a rule that Speaker Reed and Speaker Cannon never dared suggest changing. Why should the Democrats wish to trample on the rights of the minority, rights affirmed and concurred in for 72 Congress? Is it because the Democratic leadership do not trust their own huge majority of 200? Do they fear their ability to lead? I for one oppose this drastic rule.

I rest my case on two very liberal Democrats of the past, particularly Mr. Fitzgerald, of New York, a very noted chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. [Applause.]

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE].

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, the concluding remarks of the gentleman from North Carolina call for a few words. I shall not take all the time allotted to me.

He gently chided the minority for not acceding without demur to the proposals brought here to meet the great emergency. I would call to his attention and to that of the House the purposes of the two-party system. It is one of the great developments in parliamentary history. It is one of the great advantages which Anglo-Saxon people enjoy in the conduct of their governmental affairs, in marked contrast to other countries of the world where there are many parties. In England, in this country, and in all other English-speaking lands it has been found of great benefit to have opposing points of view presented; and we have reached that stage where we hold it both a public gain and a party duty, a responsibility we may not shirk.

The gentleman from North Carolina has been here much longer than I have and so has had much more opportunity to observe that criticisms by the minority party have again and again produced better legislation. We need go back no farther than last year to find illustrations of the advantages that have accrued from the detailed study of measures. One that we neglected to perfect here went over to the Senate where were made more than 40 amendments that then approved themselves to the House. It being the duty of the minority, the obligation, the responsibility, to criticize, there should be no sharp rejoinder in case we try to perform this duty. We ought to do it courteously, in no captious fashion, with no desire to obstruct, but with the desire to give help that only can come from men of a different cast of mind who are united together in what we call a political party.

Yesterday this House adopted probably the most important proposal affecting the welfare of this country, and indeed of the world, that has ever come before it. I venture to say the gentleman can present no instance in the history of parliamentary bodies where a more serious and far-reaching proposal was ever considered, and I do not except even the emergency of war, than the one we considered yesterday. Yet the minority were refused the opportunity to try to help improve the proposal by motions to instruct conferees. Perhaps we could not have done it. Perhaps the proposal was perfect. I have never seen anything perfect yet come from the brains of men, but possibly in this instance it was beyond improvement. Nevertheless, I believe that public advantage would have accrued if there could have been opportunity to apply the customary form of procedure in the way of proposal of change.

Now, sir, I realize that control of a legislative body as large as this is imperative; that there must be what we call leadership; and I have no desire to make hasty or unkind comments upon the leadership of the past 2 months. Yet it does seem to me that the public welfare would have been better secured if the minority had been given more opportunity to function.

Twenty-three years ago the greater part of the Members of this House came to the conclusion that there ought to be more opportunity for the minority to be heard and to assert itself. It is not even necessary to mention party names in connection therewith. I am talking only of principles. You will recall that the House, in its good judgment, decided it would be better if there were less control. Just one instance of what has been taking place since then: One of the reforms, as they were called, was the adoption of Calendar Wednesday. I came here 10 years or so after that reform had been adopted. It was still championed and supported and defended by the gentleman who had shared in its creation.

Leaders of the party then taking control gradually allowed Calendar Wednesday to wane in importance, and when the other side came into control 2 years ago they allowed it to disappear. Thus one of the great advantages that was sought in the liberalizing of the rules has now gone into what a good and great Democrat called innocuous desuetude.

In the present instance there comes to the surface extension of power and leadership to which we call attention. It is not because we fail to recognize the difficulties under which the present leadership of the House works. We understand the problems presented by the control of a large number of new Members unacquainted with the importance of preserving the integrity of parliamentary procedure. We understand the difficulty in controlling men who desire to have some share in the proceedings of the House. We appreciate that they are restless and that they must be held down with an iron hand if we are to accomplish our purposes, but in this case we think the leadership may have gone beyond bounds of prudence and may have established a rule that will return to work harm on those who have framed that rule. [Applause.]

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, we have been talking about a matter, the importance of which has been greatly exaggerated. We have listened to appeals to preserve the rights of the minority and how that great liberal Speaker of the old days of 1908, the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. Cannon, would not go so far as to interfere with the rights of the minority. Why, Speaker Cannon or Speaker Clark or Speaker Garner could not have done anything different from what they did do, because clause 6 of rule XVI of the rules of the House provided that on any motion, any substantive matter could be separated, if it were divisible, and a separate vote had upon it. So when Speaker Cannon ruled as he did, and Speaker Clark, in the Sixty-second Congress, and Speaker Garner in the Seventy-second Congress, they were confronted with that rule and could not evade it.

This is just what we propose to do here today. We have added to the present rule one clause, "nor shall any resolution or order reported by the Committee on Rules, providing a special order of business be divisible." The rest of the resolution is the present rule.

This change in the rules was not thought up just yesterday or even last month. It was part of a somewhat general revision of the rules of the House. It is only 1 of 5 or 6 proposed changes, some of which have been brought in here and passed and some of which are still under consideration. The rule was not held in the pocket of the Chairman of the Rules Committee, as charged here today. It was reported to the House and has been on the House Calendar since April 10, which is a situation quite different from "pocketing a rule", a la Campbell.

The necessity for this rule was brought to the attention of the House last April in connection with the consideration of the economy bill. In that instance a rule was brought in to consider the economy bill and a decision was had on the rule. Because of the experience of the House at that time, the Rules Committee, without reference to any particular legislation, recalling only that incident, decided in the very early part of this session to change the rules.

Now, what is the effect of this change in the rules? The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH] got very much excited about "protecting the rights of the minority." The gentleman knows, good parliamentarian that he is, how he could get a separate vote or amend a rule, merely by voting down the previous question on the rule and then amending it—to strike out a part or to insert some provision, so that when you are all through with either method you reach the same result.

But why does the leadership of this House want the rule? When the Rules Committee, as the distinguished chairman of the committee has said, lays out a plan for the consideration of a measure in this House, every part of the plan is necessary for its consideration.

In the economy bill last April this is what could have happened: The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON] demanded a separate vote on three lines of the resolution. When Speaker Garner sustained his contention that under the general rule as to divisibility, it applied to resolutions from the Rules Committee. This meant a separate vote on these three lines, and also, of course, a separate vote on the rest of the resolution. If he had been defeated in his attempt to strike out those three lines and they had remained and the rest of the resolution had been stricken out, you would have had the perfectly ridiculous situation of having the title to a bill and a clause in the bill which did not mean anything.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I yield.

Mr. LEHLBACH. That very argument was made on the floor and was met by Speaker Garner with the statement that the presumption is that the House will act intelligently.

Mr. O'CONNOR. He was talking, maybe, about the Seventy-second Congress. [Laughter.]

There was no argument last April about the rights of the minority. All that Mr. CANNON of Missouri was arguing was the rules or the precedents and that Speakers were bound by the standing rules of the House. There was never any question but that we could change the rules, so that there could not be a separate vote on a resolution from the Rules Committee.

Now, take the resolution that is coming in to consider the independent offices bill and let us be frank about it. Suppose you take one paragraph of that resolution and demand a separate vote and vote that out. This may make the rest of the rule absolutely meaningless. You can accomplish the same purpose in another way, and let me state to my Democratic colleagues, do not let this molasses talk we are hearing every day over on the other side ensnare any of you. They are going to vote against this rule, I imagine, solely because we want it. They have had this in their own minds for years. If they were in power, after the experience with the economy bill, they would have been in here last December with this rule.

So the Rules Committee believes that in the orderly conduct of the business of the House, without interfering in any way with the rights of any minority or any individual Member, when they bring in a rule the whole plan should be carried out or the whole plan should be defeated by voting down the rule or changed, as you may see fit, by voting down the previous question and amending the rule. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SNELL) there were 125 ayes and 59 noes.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I will withdraw that and ask for the yeas and nays on the proposition.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 240, nays 142, not voting 48, as follows:

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I desire to change my vote from "nay" to "aye" in order to move reconsideration.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I was engaged on a committee report and did not have the opportunity to hear the debate on this resolution, and am much surprised on reaching the floor to find a vote being taken to repeal the oldest rule of the House. This rule was adopted by the First Congress when it assembled and organized in New York in 1789. In fact, it is older than the House itself, as it was in force in the Continental Congress. It is astounding that anyone should suggest repealing it. It is not only hallowed by years and by the decisions of every Speaker from Muhlenberg to Longworth, but it is a fundamental adjunct to free government and is in use in every free legislative body in the world today. It guarantees the rule of the majority, and any effort to abrogate it must have as its objective the rule of less than a majority. There can be no other explanation of this proposal. The only purpose in denying the right of Members to vote on the separate propositions submitted to the House is to sandwich in with worthy issues questionable propositions they do not dare to submit on their own merits. The resolution before you is an instrument to be used by a few men in forcing down the throats of the rest of us measures so objectionable and at such variance with public sentiment that they could not be passed if voted on separately.

Mr. Speaker, this rule is one of the ancient landmarks in parliamentary procedure. It has come down to us from the time of Jefferson. It has been a part of the law of this House for a hundred and fifty years, and in all this century and a half no one before has ever proposed to lay sacrilegious hands upon it. And after it has thus served with the universal endorsement of all Speakers of all parties for 72 Congresses, it is unthinkable that the Seventy-third Congress should now wantonly destroy it for the sake of a little petty partisan advantage. It would be like an ignorant centurion burning the priceless books of a great Alexandrian library to keep warm on a chill night. It would be like destroying an ancient Greek temple to secure material for a pigsty. There is a parliamentary vandalism, Mr. Speaker, as reprehensible as that of any vandal who ever marred the paintings or broke the statuary in the Hall of Fame.

And the sad feature of the situation is that it is wholly unnecessary. There is no purpose which can be served by this extraordinary procedure which cannot be as effectually served by such reports from the Committee on Rules as are almost daily presented on this floor. It lacks even the excuse of expediency. Every Democratic legislative program since the establishment of the Democratic Party has been effectuated with this rule in full force and effect, and any future program of the Democratic Party can be as quickly and as fully consummated without this ruthless sabotage of the rules of the House.

Mr. Speaker, older Members about me here say this resolution has been brought up unexpectedly and without due notice. Surely the Members of the House cannot appreciate its full significance. They do not realize that they are voting on a proposition to destroy a rule that is older than the Capitol Building in which we sit—one of the fundamental guaranties of democratic government. For that reason, Mr. Speaker, I desire to enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution has just been adopted, in order that we may have an opportunity for some deliberate consideration before we take this unprecedented step.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I move to lay the motion of the gentleman from Missouri on the table.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. And on that, Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, because of the noise and confusion it is impossible to hear what is going on.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri moved to reconsider the vote, and the gentleman from New York moved to lay that motion on the table. The question is on ordering the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I object.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, let us understand what we are voting on. See if I am correct. The vote is on laying the motion on the table.

The SPEAKER. The vote is on the motion of the gentleman from New York to lay the motion of the gentleman from Missouri on the table.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 220, nays 140, not voting 71, as follows:

INVESTIGATION OF MOTION-PICTURE INDUSTRY

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, it was my intention to call up at this time a special rule making in order the so-called "Sirovich resolution." However, many Members have asked me to postpone calling it up at this time, and I will do so. I make this statement to inform several Members of my purpose to postpone it, because I told them earlier in the day that I would call it up. I shall call it up in the near future.

Mr. SNELL. Could the gentleman tell us when he intends to call it up?

Mr. SABATH. Some day next week, as soon as we have disposed of the appropriation bill and other important legislation.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Why does the gentleman not call it up now?

Mr. SABATH. Because many Members have asked me to postpone it, some of whom are for it and some against it.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Did they give any reason?

Mr. SABATH. Some of them were not able to be present.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, it is the purpose of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN] to call up the deficiency appropriation bill, and to have general debate upon it this afternoon and to conclude the consideration of the bill some time tomorrow. Then we hope on Friday to take up the securities bill, which will probably consume Friday and Saturday, or at least part of that day. On Monday next we hope to take up the independent offices appropriation bill.

THIRD DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL, FISCAL YEAR 1933

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 5390) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and prior fiscal years, to provide supplemental appropriations for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1933, and June 30, 1934, and for other purposes. Pending that, I ask unanimous consent that such time as is utilized in general debate be equally controlled by the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] and myself.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H.R. 5390, with Mr. McREYNOLDS in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the first reading of the bill will be dispensed with.

There was no objection.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask the gentleman from New York to consume some time.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DE PRIEST].

Mr. DE PRIEST. Mr. Chairman, very early in the history of this country about 20 people of my race group were brought over here from Africa on a Dutch trading ship, and for 244 years they served in slavery, without pay and without price. I fear that amongst them communism has been making some headway. I would rue the day when communism rules America. It is not based on American principles and certainly does not agree with our form of government. It is regretful that any racial group should be driven to think of communism in the sense of America, but so many impositions have been placed upon my group that I want to call attention to a few of them. I shall give you a synopsis of a few of them, and extend the rest of them in my remarks, if I am permitted. I ask unanimous consent to extend and revise my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. DE PRIEST. Mr. Chairman, no race of people in this country has ever been more loyal to America than the people of my race. In every period of war this country has been engaged in they have always served the American Government, and I hope they always will. They were emancipated by the proclamation issued by the immortal Abraham Lincoln in 1863. After that the Republican Party submitted to the people of this country three amendments, the thirteenth, the fourteenth, and the fifteenth amendments to the Constitution of the United States, which gave them their liberty, made them citizens, and gave them the right to vote.

Under the guise of Ku-Kluxism my people have been intimidated and bulldozed in certain neighborhoods; people who were trying to be intelligent citizens, and standing up for their manhood rights. I have seen those night-riders in Alabama, where I was born. Of course, the Ku-Klux died out shortly after that. It was reorganized a few years ago, not only fighting the American Negro but fighting the Jews and the Catholics also. Thank God they did not last very long.

Then when the Negroes were getting more power and more control in this country the hue and cry was raised in some Southern States of Negro domination. That was only a subterfuge. The Negro in America never was in the majority in any one State in the United States except the State of Mississippi. There never was any chance for Negro domination. It was only used as a subterfuge for other people to ride into office on.

Then came those days when they were deprived of their right to vote. After they had 23 Members of Congress in both bodies and for about 28 years no member of my group was able to be a Member of this Congress. If we had a right to exercise our franchise rights as the Constitution provides we should exercise them I would not be the only Negro on this floor. I hope to see the time come when the Federal Constitution will be actually enforced and that the Members of Congress who have sworn to support the Constitution will pass an act to enforce every section of the Constitution including the amendments to which I have referred.

But recently there has been some discussion on the floor of this Congress about Negroes getting a square deal over this country. There was a discussion here the other day when the resolution was introduced to impeach Judge Lowell, of Massachusetts, because of a decision which had nothing whatever to do with the innocence or guilt of this man Crawford. I know nothing about his guilt or innocence, but I do say one thing, that this House was misled. I do not say that excitedly, but this House was misled. There was not one scintilla of evidence introduced in that hearing in Massachusetts with regard to the innocence or guilt of this man charged with crime; not one. But the question was decided on its merits, on whether or not this man had been indicted by a legally drawn grand jury. The question was raised on the issue in the State of Virginia. It was proven that those of my racial group are not included in the jury system. No Member from the State of Virginia can rise on this floor and say that any negro has served on a jury in Virginia in the last quarter of a century, whether petit jury or grand jury. That was the ground on which that decision was rendered, that the jury was drawn unconstitutionally, because a certain group of people had been excluded from jury service, and not on the guilt of this man Crawford. I do not know anything about that. If he is guilty, he should be punished, but for God's sake indict him with a legally drawn grand jury.

I am stating these things not because I want to stir up any racial animosity, but the American people ought to know that 12,000,000 people should not be tempted to join some organization that is not for the best interests of America. I do not think communism means any good to this country, either to me or anybody else in it.

There was another case down in Scottsboro, Ala., quite recently, down in the State where I was born, and I have often said that if God would forgive me for being born there

I would never live there again. In reading some of the evidence in that trial it was shown that there were two white girls traveling as hoboes on a freight train dressed in overalls. It happened some two years ago. I am not saying whether those boys are innocent or guilty. I could not say, for I have not read over the testimony, but I do know that one of the girls repudiated her testimony a very short time ago in the second trial of one of the defendants, and I do know that one of the white boys who was with her substantiated her repudiation, and that is a matter of record. Everybody can read it. I do know that those boys were first convicted in the courts. The case went to the United States Supreme Court and it was reversed, and I do know that the last Negro was convicted and sentenced to the electric chair, I presume. If not, he will be; and that case will go back to the United States Supreme Court also.

I do not want a condition to arise in this country where those of my group will become discouraged and think there is no chance in America for them. I know the great rank and file of American people are on the square. I know that. But I also know what is everybody's business is nobody's business, and I also know that the great body of Christian America and the great newspapers and periodicals of this country do not universally denounce this crime of injustice meted out to those of my particular group, especially when charged with crimes of that kind. They are convicted before they are tried. I have no brief for Negro criminals. I hold no brief for any kind of a criminal, but I do wish to say that I think the time will come when a Congress of the United States—I do not care whether it be Republican or Democrat; it will still be composed of American citizens—will take this question up and see that their rights are protected. They are beginning to feel that they cannot secure their constitutional rights in the courts of our land.

This country cannot survive by keeping one tenth of its population down. It is a dangerous frame of mind for people to get into, just as the people of Iowa thought they could not secure their constitutional rights in the courts, and they made the serious mistake of trying to go into the court room and mete out so-called justice themselves by taking that judge off the bench, dragging him out into the street, and manhandling him and almost lynching him.

That is bordering on anarchy in this country. It was not brought about by the voice of the Iowa farmer. It was brought about because he thought he could not secure justice in the courts. He was wrong in this assumption, of course he was; and the Governor of the State acted as a human being ought to act. He called out the supreme power of the State to put down that insurrection.

I am making these remarks because I want you to know that the American Negro is not satisfied with the treatment he receives in America, and I know of no forum where I can better present the matter than the floor of Congress.

Down in Scottsboro conditions were so tense that it was necessary to call out the militia to protect those boys during the first trial.

A few years ago in Arkansas five members of my group were convicted of plotting against the American Government. Who ever heard of a Negro plotting against the American Government? The American Government has never had better supporters than the Negroes. They have supported it in every war. They have laid down their lives and made the supreme sacrifice for America in the past, and I hope they will do so in the future. You never heard of the assassination or attempted assassination of a President charged against members of my group. No member of my race every tried to commit assassination upon any ruler in America.

If we are good enough to lay down our lives for this country, we are good enough to enjoy the privileges of citizenship in this country.

I did not have anything to say on the floor the other day about the judge in Massachusetts because I was not given the opportunity to speak, but I did think it was uncalled-for; I did think it was premature for this Congress to go on record and authorize an investigation while the case was pending before the Federal courts.

No one is interested more than I in the continued loyalty of the people of my racial group as citizens of the United States; and being interested as I am, I want to take this opportunity to call the attention of this body of lawmakers to certain untoward events, constantly recurring, that are, to say the least, turning the thoughts of my people away from our democratic form of government and with perhaps hopeful but reluctant eyes on the dangerous communist theory in this country. The treatment colored citizens receive in this country, and especially in the courts in some parts of it, in some instances in the North as well as the South, is having a bad effect on the minds of these people. The chief justice of the Supreme Court of the State of Alabama dissented from the decision in the first Scottsboro conviction, just as the United States Supreme Court threw out that conviction as a violation of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution preventing States from depriving "any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law."

I want particularly to discuss with you the now-famous Scottsboro case where nine youths of my race are accused of raping two white girls. The injustice imposed upon these boys in the first trial where they were convicted was such that the United States Supreme Court did not think they received a fair trial and set aside the verdict and ordered a new trial, on the ground that the fourteenth amendment to the Federal Constitution had been violated. This amendment says that no person shall be denied or deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law. In this connection I wish to quote as part of my remarks an editorial in the Washington Daily News of April 10, 1933, which reads as follows:

THE SCOTTSBORO VERDICT

The conviction of Haywood Patterson, first of the Negro defendants in the second trials of the Scottsboro cases, will be appealed. It should be.

Among other things prejudicial to a fair trial, the defense was able to show that the jury law apparently was administered to exclude Negroes from the panel for this case. On more than one occasion during the trial the State attorneys conducted themselves in such a way as to prevent orderly and judicious consideration of evidence by the jury.

In repudiating her testimony at the earlier trial, Ruby Bates swore that the other girl in the case, Victoria Price, had framed the Negro youths. Lester Carter, a white friend of the two girls, confirmed the testimony of Ruby Bates.

To execute boys on the discredited evidence of a woman of Victoria Price's character, and following a trial in which racial discrimination seemed to operate in the jury panel, would be unthinkable. Just as the chief justice of Alabama dissented from the first Scottsboro conviction, and just as the United States Supreme Court threw out that conviction as a violation of the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution preventing States from depriving "any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law", so the Decatur verdict yesterday appears certain to be set aside by a higher court.

The action of courts and so-called "judicial procedure" in an atmosphere of intimidation, prejudice, and disturbance, as has happened in the Scottsboro case and as has frequently been the situation in other cases, creates disrespect of law and order and makes the Negro of America think it is impossible to get justice, especially in certain parts of the country.

May I quote again from the Washington Daily News of Tuesday, April 11, 1933, the words of Heywood Brown? He said, himself quoting—

We have no right to sit in the seats of the scornful. Nor is it the part of wisdom to think of the Scottsboro case as a local issue.

Continuing, he says:

Sunday, in Decatur, Ala., a jury of 12 white men brought in a verdict of death against Haywood Patterson. The attorney general of the great sovereign State referred to him as "that thing."

They say it was a quiet courtroom and a gentle day down in Morgan County when the jury filed in after 24 hours of deliberation. But could none of them hear the wind in the rigging of the slave ship, the creaking of her timbers, and the cries of the cargo?

Attorney General Knight could not even bring himself to admit that he was in the presence of a man on trial for his life. He had to take refuge in such a phrase as "that thing." He was afraid of the facts. He had reason to fear.

There was much panicky talk in the speeches of the men who pressed the case. "Show them that Alabama justice cannot be bought and sold with Jew money from New York!" cried Solicitor Wright at one point in the trial. And the attorney general, after deploring the injection of prejudice by his associate in the summation, went on to say: "If you acquit this Negro, put a garland of roses around his neck, give him a supper, and send him to New York City. There let Dr. Harry Fosdick dress him up in a high hat and morning coat, gray striped trousers and spats."

And that was because Dr. Fosdick had told Ruby Bates to face the danger of return and go back to confess that she lied when first she accused the Negro boys. And that was because the attorney general was afraid.

From the Afro-American, Baltimore, Md., April 8, 1933, I read the following in a news story from Decatur, Ala.:

Carter stated that he, the girls, and Orville Gilley, white, made the entire trip together and that the boys did not rape the girls. He was kept in jail at Scottsboro until the trial was over. He went to Albany to tell Governor Roosevelt about the case and then saw attorneys. He was kept in hiding.

Carter reached here at 2 a.m. Thursday. Ruby Bates is still expected.

The situation here is tense as the defense scatters the State's case.

A mob of 200 whites under Klan leadership was reported near here Tuesday night. Twenty extra guards were called out. The sheriff threatened to shoot to kill. The mob had planned to march on the jail, but dispersed when they saw they had formidable opposition.

From the Baltimore Afro-American, dated April 22, 1933, I read a news story as follows:

DECATUR, ALA.—Another picture of Alabama justice flashed across the canvas here Monday when Bailiff E. R. Brittell admitted to Judge James E. Horton that he had allowed jurors to hold telephone conversations while serving in the Scottsboro case.

Joseph R. Brodsky, attorney, immediately entered a motion to set aside the verdict which condemned Haywood Patterson to death.

I want also to quote you a speech of my colleague, Congressman TOM BLANTON, of Texas, delivered on the floor of the House March 27, 1933, following the impassioned plea of Representative SIROVICH, of New York, in behalf of the Jewish people, recent victims of attack in a foreign country. Mr. BLANTON said:

I feel just as the gentleman does, and am unalterably opposed to any and all kinds of persecutions. If there is persecution against any people because of their race, it ought not to go unchallenged.

But is it not a matter that ought to be handled by our State Department? If we go to passing resolutions, unless we direct them to our own Executive and his Department of State, would we not be invading the Executive functions of the Government? We do not like to have the executive departments invade the legislative part of the Government. In this connection may I not call the attention of my friend to the fact that there is unreasonable, foolish, cruel persecution of the Jews right here in the Nation's Capital? I do not stand for that. I am against all persecutions. I have some very close personal friends of lifetime standing who are Jews. Why should we tolerate without protest the persecutions of Jews here in Washington?

There are very prominent apartment houses here in the Nation's Capital which refuse to permit Jews to rent apartments. There are apartment houses here where people can buy homes therein as they buy a residence. If my distinguished friend would go there and say, "I am a Jew," they would say, "We cannot sell to you." There is that ridiculous persecution, with which I have no sympathy whatever, right here in the gentleman's National Capital, but we ought to get that out of the way first before we go to foreign countries. Has my distinguished friend from New York any precedents for his resolution?

The remarks, quoted above, were uttered in the course of debate, when the subject of the persecution of the Jews in Germany was before the House. Mr. BLANTON's speech pertaining to the Jews applies with equal force to all citizens alike in this country. I want to compliment him on the stand he took. I believe he is fair enough to want to mete out even-handed justice to all citizens, including the 12 million colored citizens of the United States, for I do not see how any Member of Congress can take any other stand when he remembers the oath of office he took to uphold the Constitution and our form of government.

I particularly want to call your attention to the Massie case that happened in the Hawaiian Islands. I am not pretending to say that the defendants over there, who were accused of raping Mrs. Massie, were innocent or guilty, but I do want to say that no jury had found them guilty. In their trial the jury was unable to agree on their guilt. Further, I want to call your attention to the apparent state of mind against all dark-skinned people where prejudice is allowed to defeat justice. About 140 Members of Congress signed a petition and cabled it to the Governor of the Hawaiian Islands asking the pardon of the Massies after they had been duly convicted of murdering one Kahahawai, one of the defendants accused of raping Mrs. Massie. There is no excuse that can be offered by any stretch of the imagination that will justify American citizens, either at home or abroad, or in our territorial possessions, in taking the law into their own hands.

I also wish to call attention to the fact that Lieutenant Massie is still holding a commission in the United States Navy despite conduct unbecoming a gentleman and prejudicial to the dignity of an officer of the Navy. He participated in a murder, and, according to his own testimony on the witness stand in his trial, an officer and an individual, admitted that he fired the fatal shot that killed Kahahawai. This officer of the United States Navy was convicted, sentence commuted to 1 hour, and which time was served.

All these things have a tendency to drive into the American Negro the thought that he cannot secure justice in all parts of America and that dark-skinned people in its territorial possessions are subjected to the same prejudices. I call this to your attention, knowing full well the part colored American citizens have played in all the wars of this country where the dignity and honor of the United States have been assaulted by foes within and foes without.

No man of my racial group has ever been disloyal to our flag or to our country. I hope the time will never come when he may be goaded on to that extremity. I call your attention to dangerous possibilities lurking in a discouraged, dejected, despised, mob-ridden, and intimidated group of citizens if this condition continues to prevail so that they are convinced there is no chance in this country to receive justice at the hands of our people.

I am appealing to the Christian, law-abiding people of America through its magazines, its newspapers, its periodicals, and its pulpit; through its fraternal organizations, labor organizations, church organizations, and all manner and kind of societies, to help maintain law and order in America and abolish this blight on our American jurisprudence and to help blot out the crime known as lynching. It becomes necessary also that the provisions in the Constitution must be safeguarded, so that no man shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; and due process of law means a fair and impartial trial for every citizen of our country.

He who stands idly by, knowing these conditions to exist, will be guilty of contributive negligence in not routing this monster of race prejudice evidenced in many places where it cannot be controlled but occupying too serious a place in our governmental and court procedure of the land. In the interest of America—great, shining, proud symbol of freedom and of liberty and of opportunity, of which 12,000,000 men and women, boys and girls, of my racial group are an integral part—let us stand up like men and women and uphold law and order and see that every man has a fair trial, equal opportunity, and a chance under the sun to have an existence. Only by such action on the part of the American people can America free itself of this odious institution and maintain the confidence and respect of that 12,000,000 American Negroes and also of the rest of the civilized world. It is already being said that we have no right to criticize Germany in her attitude toward the Jews, nor point the finger of scorn at Russia in her attitude against a certain class of her population, until we do justice here in America to every man, woman, and child who lives beneath the folds of the Stars and Stripes. We should remove the beam from out our own eyes before we try to take the mote from the eyes of the rest of the world.

It has not been my purpose here in this body to be radical on any question, especially on some phases of our American life that come close to me, but the time has come when someone must speak out against the damnable, lynching, menacing mob spirit which is depriving citizens of their just rights under the Constitution. This utter disregard of the rights of my people, reaching toward the doorway of our courts of justice, is all too prevalent in some parts of the country.

Let me again appeal to the American public—to you ladies and gentlemen, representatives of the people—that we strive to save America from this growing disregard of law and order. These are trying times in our political and economic life, as well as in our daily social contact, and I hazard to prophesy that the time will come when America may need every loyal citizen to defend our form of government. When that time does come, whether or not I am living, I am sure those of my racial group will stand loyally by this form of government under which we operate. That can only come about by the expressed will of the American people to see that justice is administered under all circumstances to all citizens alike, whether rich or poor, high or low, and without discrimination as to race, color, or creed.

And there now follows in rapid succession riotous demonstrations at the opening of the Mooney trial, whereby the presiding judge felt constrained to postpone the proceedings, and following this comes the assault upon a judge at the town of Le Mar, 20 miles north of Sioux City, Iowa, where the mob went so far as to place a noose, as is alleged, around the neck of the aged jurist. These riotous proceedings, coupled with a threat of impeachment of Judge Lowell, of Massachusetts, who did his duty as he saw it, contributes to a far-greater degree to the break-down of law and order than is healthy for this fair country of ours.

The issue in the Crawford case, which was discussed on the floor of this House by the gentleman from Virginia a few days ago, has nothing to do with whether or not Crawford will get a fair trial in Virginia. The sole issue involved in Judge Lowell's action was whether or not the indictment was constitutional in view of the express admission of the Virginia judge that Negroes had been excluded from the grand jury pursuant to established custom in the State of Virginia. Judge Lowell took the position that once the Virginia judge admitted he had excluded Negroes from the grand jury pursuant to the established custom, the case had been brought within the long line of precedents in the United States Supreme Court, particularly Neal against Delaware, which precedents establish that a conviction cannot be predicated upon an indictment returned by an unconstitutional grand jury. Judge Lowell said he had no doubt that Crawford would get a fair trial in Virginia but that a fair trial could not cure the illegality of the indictment which necessarily would have to serve as a foundation upon which all further proceedings would be based, and that it would be running around in a circle to send Crawford back to Virginia to answer to this particular indictment, when after trial and conviction and review up to the Supreme Court of the United States the United States Supreme Court would have to set the conviction aside in order to protect Crawford's constitutional rights as a citizen of the United States on the very same ground raised before him in the habeas-corpus proceedings, to wit, exclusion of Negroes from the grand jury pursuant to established custom. The judge, in substance, said that if the conviction would have to be set aside eventually on account of an unconstitutional exclusion of Negroes from the grand jury, it would be merely a matter of stage play to send Crawford back to Virginia to answer this unconstitutional indictment. The question of Crawford's innocence or guilt was never presented to the court or considered by it.

ELAINE, ARK., CASE

I quote from United States Supreme Court Reports, volume 261, Cases Adjudged in the Supreme Court at October Term, 1922:

Moore et al v. Dempsey, keeper of the Arkansas State Penitentiary. Appeal from the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Arkansas

No. 199. Argued January 9, 1923. Decided February 19, 1923

1. Upon an appeal from an order of the district court dismissing a petition of habeas corpus upon demurrer the allegations of fact pleaded in the petition and admitted by the demurrer must be accepted as true (p. 87).

2. A trial for murder in the State court in which the accused are hurried to conviction under mob domination, without regard for their rights, is without due process of law and absolutely void (p. 90).

3. In the absence of sufficient corrective process afforded by the State courts, when persons held under death sentence and alleging facts showing that their conviction resulted from such a trial apply to the Federal district court for habeas corpus that court must find whether the facts so alleged are true and whether they can be explained so far as to leave the State proceedings undisturbed (p. 91).

Reversed.

Appeal from an order of the district court dismissing a petition for habeas corpus upon demurrer.

Mr. U. S. Bratton and Mr. Moorfield Storey for appellants.

Mr. Elbert Godwin, with whom Mr. J. S. Utley Attorney General of the State of Arkansas, and Mr. William T. Hammock were on the brief, for appellee.

Mr. Justice Holmes delivered the opinion of the Court.

This is an appeal from an order of the District Court of the Eastern District of Arkansas dismissing a writ of habeas corpus upon demurrer, the presiding judge certifying that there was probable cause for allowing the appeal. There were two cases originally, but by agreement they were consolidated into one. The appellants are five negroes who were convicted of murder in the first degree and sentenced to death by the court of the State of Arkansas. The ground of the petition for the writ is that the proceedings in the State court, although a trial in form, were only in a form, and that the appellants were hurried to conviction under the pressure of a mob without any regard for their rights and without, according to them, due process of law.

The case stated by the petition is as follows, and it will be understood that while we put it in narrative form, we are not affirming the facts to be as stated but only what we must take them to be, as they are admitted by the demurrer. On the night of September 30, 1919, a number of colored people assembled in their church were attacked and fired upon by a body of white men, and in the disturbance that followed a white man was killed. The report of the killing caused great excitement and was followed by the hunting down and shooting of many Negroes and also by the killing on October 1 of one Clinton Lee, a white man, for whose murder the petitioners were indicted. They seem to have been arrested with many others on the same day. The petitioners say that Lee must have been killed by other whites, but that we leave on one side, as what we have to deal with is not the petitioners' innocence or guilt but solely the question whether their constitutional rights have been preserved. They say that their meeting was to employ counsel for protection against extortions practiced upon them by the landowners and that the landowners tried to prevent their effort, but that again we pass by as not directly bearing upon the trial. It should be mentioned, however, that O. S. Bratton, a son of the counsel who is said to have been contemplated and who took part in the argument here, arriving for consultation on October 1, is said to have barely escaped being mobbed; that he was arrested and confined during the month on a charge of murder and on October 31 was indicted for barratry, but later in the day was told that he would be discharged but that he must leave secretly by a closed automobile to take the train at West Helena, 4 miles away, to avoid being mobbed. It is alleged that the judge of the court in which the petitioners were tried facilitated the departure and went with Bratton to see him safely off.

A committee of seven was appointed by the governor in regard to what the committee called the "insurrection" in the county. The newspapers daily published inflammatory articles. On the 7th a statement by one of the committee was made public to the effect that the present trouble was "a deliberately planned insurrection of the Negroes against the whites, directed by an organization known as the 'Progressive Farmers' and Household Union of America', established for the purpose of banding Negroes together for the killing of white people." According to the statement, the organization was started by a swindler to get money from the blacks.

Shortly after the arrest of the petitioners a mob marched to the jail for the purpose of lynching them but were prevented by the presence of United States troops and the promise of some of the committee of seven and other leading officials that if the mob would refrain, as the petition puts it, they would execute those found guilty in the form of law. The committee's own statement was that the reason that the people refrained from mob violence was "that this committee gave our citizens their solemn promise that the law would be carried out." According to affidavits of two white men and the colored witnesses on whose testimony the petitioners were convicted, produced by the petitioners since the last decision of the Supreme Court hereafter mentioned, the committee made good their promise by calling colored witnesses and having them whipped or tortured until they would say what was wanted, among them being the two relied on to prove the petitioners' guilt. However this may be, a grand jury of white men was organized on October 27 with one of the committee of seven and, it is alleged, with many of a posse organized to fight the blacks upon it, and on the morning of the 29th the indictment was returned. On November 3 the petitioners were brought into court, informed that a certain lawyer was appointed their counsel, and were placed on trial before a white jury—blacks being systematically excluded from both grand and petit juries. The court and neighborhood were thronged with an adverse crowd that threatened the most dangerous consequences to anyone interfering with the desired result. The counsel did not venture to demand delay or a change of venue, to challenge a jurymen, or to ask for separate trials. He had no preliminary consultation with the accused, called no witnesses for the defense, although they could have been produced, and did not put the defendants on the stand. The trial lasted about three quarters of an hour and in less than 5 minutes the jury brought in a verdict of guilty of murder in the first degree. According to the allegations and affidavits, there never was a chance for the petitioners to be acquitted; no jurymen could have voted for an acquittal and continued to live in Phillips County, and if any prisoner by any chance had been acquitted by a jury he could not have escaped the mob.

The averments as to the prejudice by which the trial was environed have some corroboration in appeals to the governor, about a year later, earnestly urging him not to interfere with the execution of the petitioners. One came from 5 members of the committee of seven, and stated in addition to what has been quoted heretofore that "all our citizens are of the opinion that the law should take its course." Another from a part of the American Legion protests against a contemplated commutation of the sentence of four of the petitioners and repeats that a "solemn promise was given by the leading citizens of the community that if the guilty parties were not lynched, and let the law take its course, that justice would be done and the majesty of the law upheld." A meeting of the Helena Rotary Club attended by members representing, as it said, 75 of the leading industrial and commercial enterprises of Helena, passed a resolution approving and supporting the action of the American Legion post. The Lions Club of Helena at a meeting attended by members said to represent 60 of the leading industrial and commercial enterprises of the city passed a resolution to the same effect. In May of the same year, a trial of six other Negroes was coming on and it was represented to the governor by the white citizens and officials of Phillips County that in all probability those Negroes would be lynched. It is alleged that in order to appease the mob spirit and in a measure secure the safety of the six the governor fixed the date for the execution of the petitioners at June 10, 1921, but that the execution was stayed by proceedings in court; we presume the proceedings before the chancellor to which we shall advert.

In Frank v. Mangum (237 U.S. 309, 335) it was recognized of course that if in fact a trial is dominated by a mob so that there is actual interference with the course of justice, there is a departure from due process of law; and that "if the State, supplying no corrective process, carries into execution a judgment of death or imprisonment based upon a verdict thus produced by mob domination, the State deprives the accused of his life or liberty without due process of law." We assume in accordance with that case that the corrective process supplied by the State may be so inadequate that interference by habeas corpus ought not to be allowed. It certainly is true that mere mistakes of law in the course of a trial are not to be corrected in that way. But if the case is that the whole proceeding is a mask—that counsel, jury, and judge were swept to the fatal end by an irresistible wave of public passion, and that the State courts failed to correct the wrong, neither perfection in the machinery for correction nor the possibility that the trial court and counsel saw no other way of avoiding an immediate outbreak of the mob can prevent this court from securing to the petitioners their constitutional rights.

In this case a motion for a new trial on the ground alleged in this petition was overruled, and upon exceptions and appeal to the Supreme Court the judgment was affirmed. The Supreme Court said that the complaint of discrimination against petitioners by the exclusion of colored men from the jury came too late, and by way of answer to the objection that no fair trial could be had in the circumstances, stated that it could not say "that this must necessarily have been the case"; that eminent counsel was appointed to defend the petitioners, that the trial was had according to law, the jury correctly charged, and the testimony legally sufficient. On June 8, 1921, two days before the date fixed for their execution, a petition for habeas corpus was presented to the chancellor and he issued the writ and an injunction against the execution of the petitioners; but the supreme court of the State held that the chancellor had no jurisdiction under the State law, whatever might be the law of the United States. The present petition perhaps was suggested by the language of the court: "What the result would be of an application to a Federal court we need not inquire." It was presented to the district court on September 21. We shall not say more concerning the corrective process afforded to the petitioners than that it does not seem to us sufficient to allow a judge of the United States to escape the duty of examining the facts for himself when if true, as alleged, they make the trial absolutely void. We have confined the statement to facts admitted by the demurrer. We will not say that they cannot be met, but it appears to us unavoidable that the district judge should find whether the facts alleged are true and whether they can be explained so far as to leave the State proceedings undisturbed.

Order reversed. The case to stand hearing before the district court.

Under any pretense of justice should these things go unchallenged in a civilized country? I hold no brief for either black or white criminality, but I do think every man should have a fair trial before an impartial jury and not be convicted as a result of prejudice, mob law, or intimidation.

I wish to cite to you, as the extreme of mob violence and disrespect of law and order, the record of lynchings, burnings, and murders of human beings that have occurred through mob law since 1927 and down to the present time, and which speaks even louder than words.

ELEVEN LYNCHINGS FOR 1932—DECLINE OF THREE FROM 1931

NEW YORK, December 23, 1932.—A record of 11 reported lynchings for the year 1932 represents a decline of 3 from the 14 reported in 1931, according to statistics made public today by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, 69 Fifth Avenue.

Only one State, Florida, had two lynchings during the year. The other States, which each had one lynching are: Arkansas, Georgia, Kansas, Kentucky, Louisiana, Ohio, South Carolina, Texas, and Virginia.

Two of the victims of lynchings mobs were white, the remainder Negroes. Among the offenses charged to the mob victims were: Quarrel with employer who formed the lynching mob; murder; stealing $10 bill and wounding deputy sheriff; quarrel over pay, resulting in shooting; dynamiting store; insulting white women.

In all cases the mob either hanged or shot its victim, the body being subsequently burned in the case of Henry Woods, lynched at Jasper, Fla.

In making public the figures, Walter White, secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People said: "Reported lynchings are three less this year than in 1931. But satisfaction at this slight progress must be tempered by the knowledge that quasi-legal lynchings, shootings by members of posses, hasty court trials with results virtually dictated by mobs, as in Scottsboro, Ala., are little if any better than open and unashamed mob murder. The lynching spirit remains the focal problem of law enforcement in America."

The lynchings in their chronological order as listed by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, are:

1. Aged Negro. February. Body found in pond, Brooksville, Fla.
2. David Tillus, April 1, Crockett, Tex.
3. Richard Read (white) April 13, St. Francis, Kans.
4. Walter Merrick (white) May 31, Princeton, Ky.
5. Luke Marion, June 7, Ironton, Ohio.
6. Henry Woods, June 7, Jasper, Fla.
7. Henry Russell, August 29, Newton, Ga.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the Clerk may read a resolution which I send to the desk and I yield the rest of my time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH].

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the resolution will be read.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Joint Resolution 171

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two thirds of each House concurring therein), That the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution is hereby amended, when ratified by the legislatures of three fourths of the several States, and shall be valid to all intents and purposes as a part of the Constitution, by adding to section 1 thereof the following sentence: "To insure to all citizens the equal protection of the laws and a fair trial when charged with crime, the courts of the United States are hereby given jurisdiction to determine, on proper application of any defendant who is charged with crime, whether such defendant's constitutional right to the equal protection of the laws and to a fair and impartial trial is prejudiced by considerations of race, color, or creed, or any other condition to the disadvantage of such defendant, and the said United States court shall have power, subject to the right of appeal as in other cases, to transfer the trial of such case to such other jurisdiction as in the judgment of the court will insure a fair and impartial trial."

Mr. DE PRIEST. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the resolution be referred to the proper committee.

Mr. Chairman, I yield the rest of my time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman cannot yield in the second degree.

Mr. DE PRIEST. Then I yield back the balance of my time, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS].

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I want to direct the attention of those dealing particularly with our economic problems to one element in the situation which I think ought not to be forgotten.

We are dealing with inflation. We are giving to the President many different sorts of power, and the public opinion and the public purpose of the Nation are concentrating themselves upon our economic difficulties.

I have been here 20 years. It seems to me a great pity that Members of Congress cannot assemble and, figuratively speaking, sit around the council table and without oratory and without passion give intelligent, constructive consideration to their difficulties.

We have in our economic organization a maladjustment which lies at the seat of our trouble. The physician who finds his patient ill seeks by intelligent diagnosis to discover the origin of the trouble. I do not believe we are accustomed to doing this in dealing with our legislative difficulties. Some fellow gets up and makes a great big speech and somebody gets up on the other side and says it is not true, that the other thing is right. Fundamentally this is one of the difficulties. Fundamentally this is the reason we are in this situation. We have had plenty of intelligence in this country to have prevented our getting into the difficulty we are in, but we have not applied our intelligence to our problem.

We have given to this crisis in its approach as low an order of applied intelligence as ever a people gave to their difficulties. I am talking about a people now, just a people. Really, we have not given a standard of intelligence to these approaching difficulties that would reflect any credit upon 14-year-old children. I am speaking about the American people, about you and myself, your people and my people.

Another difficulty with us is that we are each one looking after his own interests, and it is natural for each to look after his own little group, but we have got to broaden out. This was all right when the individual was the economic unit and the community was the economic organization. Then we could do it. But it is not all right when your business is part of the business of my people and the business of my people is a part of the business of your people.

This is one time where we will stand or fall together. New England and Texas are one. They are part of the same economic body. We must take this psychological attitude toward our problem in order to have any chance of pulling out of the situation we are in.

I recall in the city of Dallas last fall a man whose business it was to buy jobs, that is, to buy bargains, went up to Boston, Mass. It is a long distance from Dallas, Tex., to Boston, Mass. In 5 days he spent all the money he could get buying jobs. Everybody wanted to sell him everything he had. He came home. Cotton jumped from 6 cents to 9 cents. He was able to obtain more money. He went back to Boston, stayed there 2 weeks, but could only buy $5,000 worth of stuff. The advance of the chief crop of Texas changed the market in Boston before he could get back there.

Those of us who live in the cities have the city man's angle. Those who live in the country are disposed to have the country man's angle. I live in the city myself. We have a few notions in this country that we have more or less inherited, into which we never stop to examine. In the South, where I was raised, the generation to which my father belonged inherited the institution of slavery. They never thought anything about it. I cannot conceive how anybody ever would have favored it, but they did not understand anything wrong about it. They never really thought about it. Nothing is strange which you are used to. There were no very funny names where you were raised. In New England the institution of the protective tariff has been inherited. When you were a boy you went down to your father's business establishment and found it operating under the protective tariff and you never stopped to examine the situation or the institution. I have learned to love the people who live in New England and other sections of the country. They are the same sort of people as my people. We live under different environments, that is all. It is a perfectly disgusting thing to see people who live in one community who, because they are not related to some problem as other people are, strut around as though they were made better than other people. It is not really disgusting; it is just rather pathetic. We are the creatures of environment. I understand that.

Some of my friends from New England were talking to me the other day about paternalism and they were terribly against paternalism, or they thought they were; but if I had suggested, and I did suggest in conversation with them—and wait until I get through before you draw your conclusions about what I am driving at—we talked about the tariff and I said the tariff is an exercise of the paternalistic power of government. It is the plan by which the Federal Government sees to it that the beneficiaries, the wards of the Government, get more money for their commodities than they otherwise would get. They realized this, the result. They were not willing to admit that it is paternalism. It is just a rearrangement of the story not as to whose ox had been gored but of whose ox was being fed. There is no use getting excited or calling anybody names. That attitude is not local; it is rather general among human beings. The mistake and hurt, however, are in concluding because of that fact it is a sound attitude.

I am not going to make an antitariff speech now. This is just a part of the diagnosis. Agriculture is a part of every business—in a definite sense the root of every business. It is a part of the one economic body. It is where we took sick economically. In a state of nature where economic law has control everybody buys in the cheapest market and sells in the highest market. In such a market the law of supply and demand operates freely. This is a state of nature. Then we begin to talk around in the country that we wanted our producers to live under better conditions than the producers of the rest of the world, and the scheme we adopted to bring this about was the protective tariff.

Listen to me, now, because I am not going to make the kind of speech you think I am going to make. That benefit operated to disturb the functioning of natural law. When we adopted the protective tariff we arbitrarily raised the prices of the people who were benefited by the tariff one notch above free trade. Of course, somebody had to pay the boosted prices. Immediately that lowered the grain-producers and the cotton-producers and the producers of exportable surpluses a notch below free trade, because they could not buy in the cheaper markets where they sold. This Government would not permit it.

I am talking to you now about the maladjustment of the economic machinery of this country. That is just as important to the city people and, in the long run, to the manufacturer himself as to the farmer, because there are laws of God Almighty which govern the economic body that are just as dominating and controlling as are the laws that govern the human body. We cannot any more violate them in business policy and in economic policy than we can violate them in our human body and escape.

This condition we are in now is not accidental. It comes from a violation of the laws of God Almighty that govern the economic machinery of the universe. As doctors, the time is at hand when we must make a candid diagnosis of the condition of this patient and then use our good sense in dealing with it. It does not make any difference where we live or what our business is, this thing is not far away from us. It is in us and of us, because now all businesses are interrelated and interdependent to such a complete degree as to make up one unit with a circulatory system as clearly defined as is that of the human body.

The grain farmers and the cotton farmers cultivate about 80 percent of the acreage of America.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 10 additional minutes.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I was talking to some of my friends in New York not long ago about their business conditions. They are great business men, great captains of industry, and I asked them, "How do you expect to sell your stuff in New York to people who are able to buy with only that amount of money which they receive from 8-cent oats, 15-cent corn, 5-cent cotton, and 25-cent wheat?" Those are about the prices which farmers got on the farms for the last crop.

You cannot take any more blood out of your hand through the venous system than you put in through the arterial system. That is all there is to it. This thing that is most wrong with us is a disturbance in the circulatory system; that is all. Many things are suggested; many things are doubtless needed now; but I do not care what else we do—I make this statement, and I am just as certain I am right as I live—in some sort of way we have got to give back to these producers of exportable surpluses that which represents the disadvantage which this Government creates between the protected status, the price-boosted status, of those whose prices are boosted and the farmers whose prices are below free trade.

I do not say you ought to abolish the tariff. I am not talking about it at all. I am talking about a maladjustment. Here are these farmers who take their cotton and their grain and sell it in competition with the cheapest producers on earth. We are not talking about a theory; we are talking about a fact, dealing with this economic body that is made up of all the industries and all the people of this country.

To these farmers the American market is the poorest market in which they sell. For the manufacturers it is the best market. To the American farmer it is as much lower than the foreign market as the cost of transportation from America to the foreign market.

Now, there has to be something done about it. That is what I am saying. I do not say now what you have to do about it, but I say you have to do something about this maladjustment. It violates the law of God Almighty that governs the economic body of this country. I do not care what your notion is; I do not care where you live—it has got to be done, and if we had done it before or if we would do it now we would not have to be giving all these extraordinary powers to the President of the United States, which are dangerous powers for anybody to possess. But under our circumstances it is perhaps more dangerous not to give them. That is the price we pay for the violation of a natural law.

When you trace down to the genesis of these dangerous things that governments do, you find 9 times out of 10 you are compelled to do dangerous things because you did not do the sensible, safe thing when you ought to have done it.

Suppose this thing were reversed. Suppose the manufacturers of this country sold in competition with the cheapest producers on earth. Let us get this picture. You know you cannot think in just any language you have knowledge of. Ordinarily you think in your native tongue. Suppose the manufacturers of this country sold in competition with the cheapest producers on earth and had to bring this money back here and buy agricultural products at boosted prices. How long could they do it? They say they cannot even sell in competition with the cheapest labor on earth, do they not? They say they cannot survive and do it, do they not? Then in the name of common sense how can the farmers not only sell in competition with the cheapest labor on earth but out of the proceeds of such sales pay these tariff-boosted prices in the highest market on earth? Talk about the law of supply and demand for these farmers controlling in such conditions is sheer nonsense. It is just a matter of plain horse sense—it cannot be done. But we do not even let them sell on a free-trade basis; do not forget that. We make them bring their money back here and pay the boosted prices.

I am not appealing to any prejudice; I am not talking for the farmers; I am talking for the idle millions who are walking the streets of our cities.

Agriculture is one business that is producing practically 90 percent, or it is producing practically 100 percent.

Now, I want you to visualize this. Agriculture is selling at least 80 percent of its products. Here you have a big production movement out to the city, but the trouble is we do not give the farmers enough money to draw the commodities movement from the city in their direction.

I do not care what your attitude is toward the man on the farm. We have got to work out a plan that will give him enough money in this movement of his in our direction so that we can move our stuff in his direction.

Inflation and all that kind of thing may be necessary under the circumstances which we have permitted to develop, but, in my notion, we have plenty of money, we have plenty of factories, we have plenty of people to operate them, plenty of transportation facilities, but things are not circulating. We have got to have circulation; and in order to get it the relative price of what the farmer sells must be increased until it is raised to the point where trade contact is established between his products and ours. Everybody who has any sense knows it—I mean anyone who has just a little bit of sense—if he will only look at things as they are.

When you come to examine it historically, our difficulty began in the paralysis of the purchasing and debt-paying power of these 30,000,000 farmers. I am not arguing anything, but stating what everybody knows to be the fact.

What happened? They got where they could not buy the factory goods—trucks, clothes. Agriculture is a business that wears out stuff. They use up wagons and tools; they wear out their clothing; they are consumers of everything from the factory.

I am not theorizing but I am only stating facts.

When they got where they could not sell the products of the farm at a price which would enable them to buy products from the factories, they had a little money in the bank, a little equity in property. They spent their reserves and they borrowed more money. Then they reached the point beyond which they could not borrow any more. They could not get anything from the reservoir. It was dry.

Then the village like the one I used to live in, which rested directly on top of the farms, composed of a thousand people, who got everything they had from the farmers, when the farmers could not buy from them, still the people of the village kept on buying a little while longer. Then the cities like Dallas, that I live in, with approximately 300,000 people did not buy as they had done, because they could not sell to the villages, and the villages could not buy because they could not sell to the farmers. But people in cities like Dallas drew on their savings for a while.

That sort of thing, like creeping paralysis, went on until cities like Boston and New York were in the same condition.

Now, what would a good doctor do? What would anybody with good sense do? I think he would start up the circulation where the paralysis began.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 minutes.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I am not trying to do any oratorical stunts. We have all got to sit around the council table. We fellows from the South, we men from New England, we from the West and the North are not getting anywhere with all this legislation we are passing now, except just hoping to live until tomorrow. The real job is yet to be done. I am not criticizing. I am going along with the program. The President is trying to turn us face around in the right direction. I am doing my mite to help, but we must not forget the job of tomorrow, everybody's job.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. MOTT. Everyone, of course, will agree with everything the gentleman has said, particularly his statement to the effect that what should be done is to get our wealth and products and money into circulation.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. MOTT. Has the gentleman a suggestion as to how Congress can bring that about?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I believe I will speak about that briefly though my purpose on this occasion is to help, if I can, toward an agreement upon at least one basic thing upon which, in my judgment, there must be agreement if we are to work out of our difficulty. I have spoken of the tariff. I recognize that we cannot at this time deal with the tariff as an academic proposition. I recognize that as a fact. I believe this country made two tremendous mistakes. One was slavery and the other the adoption of the protective tariff. I believe if we had remained an agricultural country, and our people had done their own work, and we had let nature take its course, we would have had cities early enough, but we cannot deal with that now. I lay this down as a sound proposition: As long as we have the protective tariff we have to give back to these producers of the exportable surpluses, arbitrarily, by the Government that which we take from them arbitrarily by the Government to maintain the tariff system. Answering the question propounded to me, I favor a straight export debenture, myself. Does that answer the gentleman's question?

Mr. MOTT. That answers it partially. I also believe that way if the gentleman cares for my views. But my particular question was directed to the possibility of Congress doing anything to restore prosperity by getting our goods and wealth and money into circulation, as the gentleman has suggested. Does the gentleman think Congress has already done that?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I repeat what I have said; we have been going along foolishly and irresponsibly until we have reached the brink. Extreme measures have to be resorted to to save us from the most imminent peril of the greatest magnitude. Arbitrary things are being done, but these things do not fit into the ordinary times and lives of a free people. They do not tend toward self-thinking and self-acting, without which the development of individual capacity necessary to maintain free government is impossible.

If we revive the buying power of these farmers by giving back to these farmers what we have taken from them by the might of government to support the tariff-boosted prices of others, I think it would help very much. This is the one place in our economic body where we know that an act of government has disturbed natural arrangement. We will have to give it back to them arbitrarily, since we have taken it away from them arbitrarily. I do not believe in the idea that is involved in many of these measures, that we should regard our agricultural surplus as something that is a curse from God to be got rid of. Why, there is not a statesman in Central Europe who would not give half the economic strength of his people to have that sort of a surplus. I agree we are producing too much. The land is too hard-driven. There are two sides to this problem, and we must not lose sight of the other side. From what I see of the people, it is as much a problem of underconsumption as of overproduction. If we would reestablish the broken trade contact between our factories and our farmers, we would consume more of their products and they would start our idle people and our idle factories to work. If we would give to them in addition to present prices what we take from them to boost our factory prices out of their reach, we would about do the job, aside from the condition created by our indebtedness, and it would help that greatly.

Mr. MOTT. That is my question. What does the gentleman suggest?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Straight export debenture. That is my notion. Of course I am going along with the program.

Mr. MOTT. That will restore prosperity?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. It would greatly help. That is what I think. If you can revive the buying power of these farmers, give to them for that which they sell to us a price proportionate to that which they pay for stuff that we sell to them, they would begin to buy and villages like Garland, where I used to live, would buy and cities like Dallas, where I now live, would buy, and factories would hum again. There is no doubt about that. I do not care what you do. You can inflate and inflate and do whatever you please. That would help probably with our indebtedness. But until you remove that economic maladjustment under which a part of the producers of this country have their prices boosted above free trade and part of the people have their prices driven below free trade, you cannot straighten this situation out.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. EDMONDS. I take it that you think now that the present bills that we are passing are only temporary and that the result will not be permanent?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. That is right.

Mr. EDMONDS. And Congress should get to work and do something that will permanently meet this situation.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I would like to put it in this way: Democrats, Republicans—East, West, North, and South—I think the time has come in this country when, regardless of where we come from or what our people do, we have to recognize that we are one country and that every business is a part of every other business, and devote good old-fashioned practical horse sense to a consideration of our problems, recognizing that there are laws of nature, laws of God Almighty, that govern the economic and political machinery of the people, just the same as there are natural laws that govern the machinery of the human body, and that a maladjustment such as I have pointed out must be corrected, just as a similar maladjustment in the circulatory system of the human body would have to be corrected. And it is a job for all of us and big enough for all of us, Democrats and Republicans, from the North and the South, and from the East and the West. Of course, there are other important problems, such as marketing, preservation of soil fertility, and so forth, but in this discussion I am dealing with only the one, this governmental discrimination against agriculture and the effects for which that discrimination is in no small degree responsible, and which must be corrected regardless of what else may be done. [Applause.]

Mr. BACON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH].

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I had gotten my alleged mind all worked up and lined out to make what I have heard called in another body a few unnecessary observations concerning certain features of the so-called "independent offices appropriation bill", but listening to the exceedingly interesting address of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] has pretty nearly thrown me out of step, and I am fearfully tempted to discuss what he has been discussing.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Please do so.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I shall not for any length of time, but may I say, without making any effort to diagnose the nature of all our troubles and with not much confidence that I would ever be able to propose a panacea, that commencing with August 1, 1914, the human race has suffered from its own excesses in peace and in war. Certainly no one would deny that the four and a half years of warfare was an example of human excesses never equaled in the history of the world.

The destruction of property and life which we, in our optimism, believed for a few years after the close of hostilities could be repaired in a moment, that same destruction of property and of life at wholesale is still handicapping our efforts toward progress. Then, instead of behaving sensibly immediately upon the close of hostilities, a so-called "treaty of peace" was entered into at Versailles, many of the provisions of which violate all sense of proportion and decency of thinking people, patriotic people, in various nations, and many of which, in addition, violate economic laws, especially in their effect upon international trade.

Then, again, in our optimism we allowed ourselves to fall prey to that human weakness which leads multitudes of people into believing that the past may be forgotten—the destruction, distress, and sorrow—and to embark upon a great program of industrial expansion the world over. And the cry was, in spite of the huge debts piled up during the war, figures never before dreamed of in the history of man, "let us borrow some more; let everybody borrow"—governments,

States, municipalities of all kinds, villages, counties, school districts, corporations, individuals. The cry was for more credit. I heard it in another branch of this Congress 7, 8, 9, or 10 years ago. More credit! more credit!—forgetting that every time you create additional credit you create an additional debt. So it went, a perfect orgy of it, some of it politically agitated by the people of both great political parties in this country; much of it politically agitated by leaders of political movements in other countries, and government after government went into it, government after government tried to persuade their people to go into it still further and further, until finally the props which for the moment, for a few years, had upheld this great flimsy structure, those props which had been weakened by the wholesale destruction of property during the World War, collapsed, and the whole business smashed down into the cellar, the effect, in my humble judgment, of the excesses committed by human beings in peace and in war. The human race has piled up a debt in the aggregate which it cannot pay. It is too big. This Congress is making an effort to relieve certain sections of our people of that debt. I might make this observation, that a large portion of the ills of the people of this world today is due to the unwise political acts of governments and of peoples. [Applause.]

And if we would repeal, if nation after nation would repeal nine tenths of the attempts to alter economic law by statute, we would emerge from our difficulties a great deal quicker than we will by any artificial device added to the multiplicity of artificial devices already on our statute books. [Applause.]

Mr. THOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield; yes.

Mr. THOM. Will the gentleman specify the particular pieces of legislation in the United States that ought to be repealed? Not all of them, of course.

Mr. WADSWORTH. For one, I never had any confidence in the attempt to fix or peg prices of wheat and cotton.

Mr. THOM. Well, that has been repealed.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; that has been repealed. I have no faith in this farm-relief measure. It is a price-fixing measure, and in my judgment its provisions are fantastic. It will not help the farmers of this country or the country at large. It is another artificial device engaged in by Government. I do believe that those measures which tend soundly to relieve great numbers of people of the severity of their debt, so that it may be extended over a period of years and make it a little easier for the debtor to pay, are wise measures. I have supported and would continue to support measures of that kind, such as the farm mortgage bill and the home owners' mortgage bill, each of which, as you will recall, provides for certain bond issues, $2,000,000,000 in each bill. My present dread is that inflation will destroy the value and effectiveness of those bonds, and that those two measures will be killed by that third measure which is contained in the omnibus bill now gone to conference.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. RANKIN. I think the gentleman put his finger on the sore spot when he spoke of the overwhelming burden of debts throughout the world as a result of the World War. Will the gentleman suggest how those debts can be met? how that question is to be disposed of?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think no one government can do that, and I doubt if any government can do it within its own borders.

Mr. RANKIN. Can they all do it on present price levels?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is doubtful that they can all do it simultaneously at present price levels, but it is equally doubtful that governments, acting together, can arbitrarily change price levels.

Mr. RANKIN. I am not trying to argue with the gentleman, but I am trying to get his idea as to what policy, in his judgment, it would be necessary to pursue to meet that overwhelming burden that confronts the people of the world today.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Generally speaking, I would answer the gentleman in this way: As soon as possible, let economic law take its course.

Mr. RANKIN. It is taking its course now.

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; it is constantly interfered with. And thus far the interference has done no good.

Mr. RANKIN. Suppose we let the economic law take its course. Today we are on a price level about one third or one fourth as high as it was when these debts were incurred. We are now asked to pay these debts—not only the people of the United States but, as a rule, the people of the world are asked to pay these debts—fixed charges, with commodity prices; and if you take it on an average, including wages, and people who are receiving no wages at all, the average is only about one third of what it was when the debts were incurred. Under these conditions how are the people of the world ever to meet these debts without bringing this price level back to what it was when the debts were incurred?

Mr. WADSWORTH. The gentleman evidently has in mind, of course, an increase in the circulating medium as the method of bringing up the price level. My judgment is—and I do not pretend to be an economic expert concerning these things—that that is another artificial device which, while it is attractive, may turn around and hit you before you have had it in operation very long.

Mr. RANKIN. We had an inflation of the circulating medium at the time these debts were contracted. Now, my only answer to this question is to bring back the price level by an increase of the circulating medium. By what other method can we find a way out of this dilemma?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have not believed in the export debenture. Nevertheless, it has always appealed to me that the prosperity of agriculture—and I agree with the gentleman from Texas that the prosperity of agriculture gives prosperity to the rest of our economic structure—rests upon its ability to get rid of its exportable surplus. The return of the buying power of the rest of the world is just as important as the restoration of the buying power of our own people. I do not believe buying power can be restored by doubling the number of dollars.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman would it interrupt the gentleman if I asked a further question?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I want to get to another phase before very long. I did not realize I was getting in so deep.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. We will get the gentleman more time. The gentleman is very well informed. The gentleman has spoken of the artificial and arbitrary nature of many devices that have been used. In the judgment of the gentleman if one arbitrary thing is at work can we expect the economic law to correct the results of the arbitrary thing?

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; we cannot.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Then it is necessary to do another arbitrary thing to balance against the first one.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I wonder if that is the right way to solve it? I am not directing attention solely to the protective tariff in the principle of which I believe, but there are too many arbitrary things going on the world over these days that interfere with these natural laws.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I agree thoroughly with the gentleman. Let us take the principle of the tariff for instance. The tariff is a policy under which by might of government something is taken away from one group and given to another. This being so, is it not necessary to take back from this group and give it to those from whom you have taken it in order to counteract the interference with the operation of the natural law?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have not attempted to make a complete discussion of the whole situation.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I wish the gentleman would take the time to go into it farther.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do not have enough time to completely discuss this subject.

I think others than the United States are involved in this thing. I think no additional artificial device employed by the United States will correct our whole domestic situation until artificial devices in other countries can be done away with. Today there are quotas and restrictions against us and all sorts of things directed against the United States.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Would it interrupt the gentleman if I asked one more question?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It certainly interrupts, but I do not mind. I shall try to answer the inquiry, but I am not sure I know the answer.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Well, none of us does.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I admit I am groping around myself.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Well, all of us are. We have plenty of time this afternoon. The galleries cannot hear us, so we might as well talk about this thing.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is a pleasant conversation.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. And a valuable one, too. Here is my opinion: With agriculture prostrate and almost bled white, should we not give it a blood transfusion? Would not that be the evolution of natural law?

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; that is not the evolution of natural law. I do not think the pending measures constitute blood transfusion. I speak from the point of view of a farmer. That has been my life and the life of my father before me.

Mr. CLAIBORNE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I was endeavoring to reply to the gentleman from Texas. Perhaps I had better proceed with what I arose to say. He has greatly tempted me.

Mr. ALLGOOD. We will yield the gentleman more time.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from New York 15 minutes' additional time.

Mr. ALLGOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. ALLGOOD. The gentleman said he believed in letting things take their natural course. Does that mean liquidation?

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; I do not think we need to liquidate entirely. A vast amount of liquidation has taken place already and I dare say it is not all over yet.

Mr. ALLGOOD. I understand that the funded debt of the Nation, the towns, cities, and municipalities, including also private debts, aggregates about $240,000,000,000.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am not familiar with the figures.

Mr. ALLGOOD. And that our estimated wealth is about $230,000,000,000 or $240,000,000,000.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is a bad prospect.

Mr. ALLGOOD. If you let matters take their natural course and liquidate, the gentleman can see the condition in which we will all be. It will just mean the wiping out of our holdings.

Mr. WADSWORTH. On the gentleman's statement, that is a bad prospect.

I said a moment ago that I had not much faith in the pending measure for the relief of agriculture. I referred to the "farm relief bill," so-called. I think that is an additional artificiality which will not work, and I was about to say I am rather old-fashioned on that, being in the business myself and having been in it all my life.

Thus far, in my humble judgment—and I say this with much humility and with some trepidation—I have gained the impression that most of the so-called "farm relief bills" have been well calculated to relieve the farmer of what he has left, and as a member of that trade or vocation I as an individual would rather be left alone, provided I can get some easement for my debt. I do not want my business regulated by the Secretary of Agriculture or anyone else. If I am not fit to conduct it, then I deserve to lose it, and I hope that Uncle Sam will never be dressed up as a nurse-girl to take care of people who cannot run their businesses.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. If the gentleman will yield, I should like to ask the gentleman if Uncle Sam has not been acting as a nursemaid for special privilege in this country for many years, and if the Government has not pegged the price of aluminum and the price of plate glass and the price of many other articles that have been controlled by those in high Government authority in this Nation for many years.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I had not been aware of that, and had thought competition still existed in this country, and I still hope it does.

I now desire to get to another branch of my statement.

Mr. PATMAN. May I suggest to the gentleman that the price of aluminum has remained the same during this time?

Mr. WADSWORTH. If I may now continue my old-fashioned remarks, I had expected to say something on the independent offices bill in relation to that part of the bill which gives to the President the power to do things to the Army. I had thought that bill would come before the House this afternoon, but I am informed it will not come before the House until Monday afternoon; and as I shall not be able to be here on Monday, being under obligation to pursue an agricultural errand upon that day in the city of Chicago, at the much-abused stockyards, I am imposing upon the patience of the House for a few moments to say something about the Army and some of the proposals which have to do with it.

Not long ago there was given out from some source of authority—I cannot quite identify the source—a program for a drastic reduction in the Army of the United States, designed to save, it is alleged, $90,000,000 from the military activities appropriations for the War Department.

The program included proposals for the furloughing of between three and four thousand Regular Army officers at half pay, plus pay to enable them to reach their homes wherever those homes may be, and most of them have no homes; the discharge of 12,000 enlisted men from the Army; a substantial reduction of flying pay for the members of the Air Corps; the abandonment of the National Guard training camps, which are run each summer for 2 weeks; the abandonment of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps training camps; and various other reductions in the military activities of the Army of the United States.

I say that I have not been able to identify the source of this announcement which was made Nation-wide and in great detail. I sat as a spectator in the room of the Committee on Military Affairs the other day listening to an assistant to the Director of the Budget while the members of the committee, and especially the chairman, the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. McSWAIN], who is present here, endeavored to find out just what were the plans of the administration with respect to the handling of the Army and the proposed economies. I think I am not far wrong in saying that the committee found out just exactly nothing, as the gentlemen before the committee at that time said there were no plans and he did not know where these suggestions had come from, and that all that he had in mind was that the President be given the power to do all these things, which, of course, leaves me, and would leave the average Member of the House of Representatives, completely in the dark as to what is to happen to national defense if these bills pass.

I do not need, I am sure, to enlarge upon the terrific effect upon the Military Establishment of the carrying out of the proposals which have been made. I suspect some of them will be abandoned, because already they are beginning to acquire an atmosphere of absurdity. For example, with respect to the proposal to furlough between 3,000 and 4,000 officers of the Regular Army at half pay, let us remember another thing which the Government is embarked upon, and that is the so-called "reforestation camps."

I happened to drop into the War Department the other day to inquire about the progress made in recruiting these unemployed young men and sending them to the camps and was shown a map of the United States upon which there were indicated by pins inserted in the surface of the map the camps which have thus far been approved. This was at the beginning of last week.

Up to that day 749 of these forest camps had been approved as to their location. The War Department, the General Staff, has been informed by higher authority that the total number will be 850 camps.

It is interesting to know that while the bill which authorized the President of the United States to take these 250,000 young men was under discussion, and sometime before, it was generally understood and asserted by a large number that there would be nothing military about the camps. Perish the thought, said the pacifists, that 250,000 of these young men should be put under the brutal influence of officers of the Army. That would be a terrible thing. So it was announced at that time that the Labor Department was going to do the work of recruiting and sending the men to the camps. But it turned out that the Labor Department had no offices distributed over the United States suitable for gathering in this army of 250,000 young men. Suddenly somebody remembered that the Army had recruiting stations scattered over the country, and so a hard-boiled sergeant out on the sidewalk herded them together, took them upstairs, and an Army medical officer gave them an examination.

Then it was remembered that the Labor Department did not have any places scattered over the country where these youngsters could be conditioned. So, come to think of it, the Army has posts, and we will send them to the Army posts; and so it was done. And the recruits were sent to the quartermaster stores, where they were fitted out and given blankets, and so forth.

Then it turned out that the Labor Department had no means of feeding 250,000 young men, but, come to think of it, the Army quartermaster has those facilities, and so the old rolling field kitchen made its appearance. Then, later on, it was determined that some sanitary measures had to be enforced, and the Labor Department has no facilities for that. But, come to think of it, the Army had officers with medical training, and so medical officers were put in the camps.

Then, of course, there must be some kind of discipline, and so it has been determined that 4,000 officers of the Regular Army must go to the camps and remain on duty for the duration of the camps.

My suggestion is, why delegate to the President power to furlough officers out of the Regular Army, when the War Department is already under instructions to use 4,000 of its officers for this forest army, and the furloughing of Regular officers is utterly impossible unless, indeed, we want to take the absurd step of one group of officers being turned out at half pay and reserve officers being brought back to active duty at full pay in their places. These things occur to us from time to time as we read of these proposals. Somebody got off on the wrong foot with respect to this particular one. It may have been a trial balloon or just an error, a poor calculation. To me—and I do not mean to use any harsh language—it has the aspect of being a half-baked proposal.

I want now to read a letter from a corporal in the Regular Army. His name is Gallagher, a pretty good fighting name. Gallagher is the type of man which I dare say Professor Moley and Professor Tugwell have never come in contact with. It is apropos of the duty which the Army, with little thanks from anybody—that is the fate of the Army in time of peace—is now doing with respect to the C.C.C. camps. That sounds like an hypodermic injection, but it is not. It is the Civilian Conservation Corps. This letter is written to me under date of April 21. Gallagher has something to say about the regular soldier, and so seldom is it that the regular soldier's psychology is discussed on the floor of Congress that I beg you to listen to this letter. You may be somewhat surprised at its literary style and the intelligence with which the man discusses a very human problem.

Before reading the letter I say that in the interview, to which he refers in the Buffalo paper, I made the statement that the private soldier receives $21 a month. The letter reads as follows:

BUFFALO, N.Y., April 21, 1933.

The Honorable JAMES W. WADSWORTH,
House Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: Today's issue of the Buffalo Courier-Express carries an article relative to the statement by the Congressman dealing with the economic angle and relation of the Regular Army and the Civilian Conservation Corps. It is only natural that I, or any other enlisted man of the Regular Army, should take cognizance of your particular statement. Hence this letter.

The statement in itself explains a thought that has been in every enlisted man's mind ever since the idea of the reforestation camps was instituted. On one hand are professional soldiers—who have devoted the best years of their lives to the service of the country—training men who, under ordinary conditions, would have ridiculed the soldier's occupation, and are receiving a pay in excess of the individual soldier.

A "forest army" recruit receives $30 per month; takes no oath of enlistment, but rather an "oath of enrollment", which in reality is no oath at all. If perchance he decides that his mother made better meals or that his bed at home had been a little more comfortable, all he has to do is to pack up his few personal belongings and his home. There is absolutely nothing that can be done, either by disciplinary action or moral ethics. As a matter of fact, the "political army" hasn't one binding tie.

On the other hand, the Regular Army soldier is bound by his oath of enlistment, and voluntarily so, in addition to Army Regulations, garrison and company orders. The pay of a private is not $21 per month, the recent 15-percent reduction setting his pay at $17.85 per month. His laundry deduction further reduces this amount until the average is receiving but $16.35 in actual cash each pay day. Of course, Army critics will say this is all clear money. But is it? From this amount the soldier is required to maintain his uniforms and equipment in a clean and serviceable order. The purchase of cleaning polishes and the pressing of his uniforms will require at least $2 more per month of the soldier's money. His toilet articles, hair-cuts, and cigarettes will still further reduce this amount to the point where a private who has a $10 bill left is rather fortunate. Under present economic conditions many enlisted men are aiding their relatives in whatever small way they can; and granting that he sent the entire amount over and above his actual necessities, he could not help more than to the extent of $10 per month.

At the present time I am a member of the Second Corps Area recruiting service, assigned to duty at Buffalo, N.Y. On April 10 this station began the allotted 600 applicants for the city of Buffalo. On April 14 the Buffalo office had completed its quota, 300 men having been sent to Fort Niagara, N.Y., and 300 to Madison Barracks, N.Y. Every one of these men was sent to this office from the Labor Department through the local welfare agency. Naturally each applicant was required to present his enrollment application, duly approved by the labor and welfare departments, when he arrived here. In no case was there an application which contained a dependency allotment for less than $22 per month, and in a few cases it reached $25 per month to dependents. This is all very fine, and no doubt will be of great assistance to many deserving relatives, but Regular Army soldiers under the same conditions cannot allot more than $10 per month to their needy dependents. Under present Army recruiting standards it is safe to say that not more than 30 percent of the forest-army applicants could have passed the Regular Army mental and physical examinations, while the Civilian Conservation Corps requirements were summed up in the telegraphic instructions as "to be able to perform ordinary labor."

As a matter of record, a large number of the Civilian Conservation Corps enrolled applicants were men who had previously been rejected at this station for Regular Army service, and because of this inferiority they now receive $30 a month instead of the Regular Army pay of $17.85 per month. Even as a private, first class, in the Regular Army he would be receiving but $25.50 per month at present. Is it any wonder, then, that many Regular Army soldiers are speaking of taking their discharge upon dependency and enrolling in the forest army? In the interest of economy such a procedure will have defeated its own purpose. Now that the administration is considering the discharge of 12,000 enlisted men, it will in many cases not only place the discharged soldier upon the shoulders of some welfare agency but, in the absence of his assistance, will very often place his immediate family upon a charitable agency. All this aside from the point of moral and self-preservation. It seems that the Regular Army soldier is the real "forgotten man." After all, he, too, is a citizen of the United States.

Thanking you for your tolerance, I am, confidently and respectfully yours,

WILLIAM M. GALLAGHER,
Corporal (DEML) (RS).

I might inject this observation in view of the statement I just read: That I heard today, through an indirect channel, but nevertheless entirely reliable, that a major general commanding a division in the Southwest reports that his men are tumbling over themselves trying to get out of the Regular Army and into the forest army.

Mr. THOM. Service in the forest army, of course, will only be for 6 months, the gentleman understands?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do; but I have been talking about the psychological effect upon the soldiers of the Regular Army. Gentlemen of the House, we should not have reduced the pay of these Regular Army privates and corporals. Witness their humiliation under the circumstances described by Corporal Gallagher. Witness the effect upon their morale. Remember, these men are relied upon to give everything they have in the service of their country. They are a lot of self-respecting, upstanding, clear-eyed fellows who set a fine example to the rest of us. Gallagher is a type. You will find him today in the Fifteenth Infantry at Tientsin calm in the midst of Asiatic chaos. He endures the drenched heat of the Isthmus. He stands guard in the sunlight of Hawaii and the snows of Alaska. Yes; all too often he is the "forgotten man." But he is human; also, he is a fellow citizen of ours. Let him be treated decently by the Representatives of the people he serves in peace and in war.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

During the reading of the letter the following occurred:

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present. The gentleman from New York is making a very interesting speech, and I think he should have a quorum.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Oh, do not do that. I would rather yield the floor than put Members to that trouble.

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. McFARLANE). The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and five Members are present, a quorum.

(Mr. WADSWORTH concluded the reading of the letter.)

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present, and I call the Chair's attention to the fact that a number of gentlemen on the floor are ex-Members, and also to the fact that there are employees of the House on the floor, and I ask the Chairman not to count them in determining the presence of a quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count only Members. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and one Members present, a quorum.

Mr. BUSBY. The Parliamentarian has not been counted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Parliamentarian informs the Chair that he has counted 102.

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TRUAX].

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. TRUAX. I yield.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. As a fellow farmer of the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], I should like to state that the gentleman from New York said something in his remarks at the beginning which interested me very much. He said he was going to make this speech today because he could not be here Monday; that he was going to be at the stockyards at Chicago. That remark created a great deal of curiosity in my mind. I have fat cattle to sell, and I am telling them to hold them because the market is going to get better on account of the inflation. I wonder if the gentleman from New York is going there to buy cattle and put them in the feed yard next Monday because this inflation is coming? [Laughter.]

Mr. TRUAX. In answer to the gentleman's question, I would say, in view of the gentleman's reputation as a good business man, he is going to buy cattle on Monday, not alone because of the inflationary monetary program but also because of the farm relief bill that has been sponsored by the greatest and most constructive President that this country has had in decades, Franklin D. Roosevelt. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, it is not my intention to criticize any of the remarks made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], but since the gentleman has criticized certain appointees of President Roosevelt and certain policies that have been enacted into law by this Seventy-third Congress, it becomes my duty to make a few observations concerning the farm relief bill.

In the first place, I have been a farmer all my life. Until 1923 every dollar I ever made in the world was made from a farm. Following 1923 I had to seek other sources of income, as did thousands of farmers in this country of ours, to make a living and to pay taxes on my farm. A farm today, my friends, is a very good investment if you have sufficient income to support it. So far as I am concerned,

I am one of those 3,000,000 farmers in this country today who is hanging on by the skin of his teeth. I have done my best.

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Chairman, a quorum evidently is not present. I make the point of order that a quorum is not present. We should not be proceeding with a handful of Members. I am going to insist that a quorum remain present.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. McREYNOLDS). The Chair will count. [After counting.] Sixty-eight Members are present; not a quorum.

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed Mr. AYRES of Kansas and Mr. BUSBY to act as tellers.

The Committee divided; and the tellers reported there were ayes 1 and noes 76.

So the motion was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. Evidently there is not a quorum present. The Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BUSBY. Is the roll call automatic?

The CHAIRMAN. There is no automatic roll call.

Mr. BUSBY. I understand no motion has been made that there be a call of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. BUSBY] suggested that there was not a quorum present. No quorum is present. The Committee has refused to rise. The Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the roll call is not in order, because there is no authority for a roll call in Committee of the Whole.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. McREYNOLDS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H.R. 5390) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and prior fiscal years, to provide supplemental appropriations for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1933, and June 30, 1934, and for other purposes, and finding itself without a quorum, he had directed the roll to be called; whereupon 334 Members responded to their names, a quorum, and he presented a list of absentees for recording in the Journal.

The SPEAKER. The Committee will resume its session.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Chairman, I feel that a somewhat further explanation is due to the Members who were so suddenly called from their labors in their offices. I want to assure them that I was not responsible for this call. I enjoy, I think, the friendship of all the Members of this House. The Speaker of the House has been exceedingly kind to me. So has the Chairman of this Committee, and this Committee itself. I want to give you this explanation of this somewhat unusual procedure.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] was delivering an address here and was discussing the merits and demerits of the new farm bill. At one stage of his address he said:

I want no one, including the Secretary of Agriculture, to be a wet nurse to me.

Thereupon my distinguished colleague the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. BUSBY] made the point of order that there was no quorum present.

After I had started my address I proceeded to the point where I said: "I am one of 3,000,000 farmers in this country who is hanging on by the skin of his teeth, and I am willing to accept any old wet nurse that will pull me out of the hole." [Applause.] Whereupon again the distinguished gentleman from Mississippi made the point of order that there was not a quorum present. Now, as to whether his mind and thoughts were reverting to my remarks a few days ago upon the sex appeal of the American hog I do not know. However, I want to thank the gentleman from Mississippi from the bottom of my heart for getting the Members here on the floor to listen to what I am about to say. [Applause.]

This morning I introduced from the floor of this House a bill which I want each and every one of you, if you please, to give your most serious attention and consideration. I herewith give you 10 good reasons for the immediate enactment of legislation suspending foreclosures:

First. Delay and inaction of Congress and the State legislatures has cost thousands of farmers and home owners their life savings.

Second. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation has loaned more than two billion and a half dollars to banks, railroads, and financial institutions, who hoard this money and will not lend to property owners.

Third. Land values and farm commodities are lowest in history. Foreclosure now is confiscation and legalized burglary.

Fourth. Money is unavailable for property loans because of a money famine. The Seventy-third Congress will remedy this by expansion of the currency.

Fifth. What has been held as law is now regarded as injustice. What was formerly held as orderly Government procedure is now recognized as ruthless tyranny.

Sixth. Each additional foreclosure means lower values.

Seventh. Property owners do not seek dismissal or cancellation of debts. All they want is temporary relief, simple justice.

Eighth. Legislatures of several States have passed or are enacting moratoriums. Ohio will be forced to do likewise.

Ninth. President Roosevelt's farm and home mortgage plans will refinance mortgaged property at low interest rates.

Tenth. Corrective legislation now will prevent wholesale debt repudiation and armed revolution.

The gentleman from New York read a letter from a soldier to prove his point. I want to read to you, as a preliminary to my bill, a letter from a 13-year-old girl back in my State of Ohio. The letter reads as follows:

Am only 13—14 this next April 28, 1933. And how I want to thank you for your stand in asking that foreclosures cease. Mother and daddy have worked unceasingly, scrimpingly, saving every penny, that we children might have a place to call our own home. Right now I'm the oldest, then Billy turned 12, Elaine just now 8, and little Pete just half past 2. You see Mr. Downs, an old gentleman who owns about 35 to 40 houses, has a second mortgage of $500 on our home and he has threatened to take it away from over our heads. Daddy pays him 8 percent, but is a little back on it; now, this old man is not bluffing, no, siree; because he does that all over and gets the houses; then the Citizens Savings & Loan is foreclosing wholesale here in Mansfield, Ohio. Mr. Bristol is a terrible man, although he hasn't bothered us yet, only once. Mother was in the Thomas Hospital 3½ months; she almost died, but that didn't make any difference to them! they said so. Now, if daddy had been a bad man or bootlegger, we surely would have been sitting pretty because they seem to be the ones that have their homes paid for, and their stockings ain't full of darns like ours. Our clothes are all made-over things, thanks to mother's needle, but I always have that awful dread when I go to bed of what will happen to our home tomorrow. Am a student of general languages and business training at junior high school, and if you need me down there to tell those gentlemen in Washington, D.C., just let me know; perhaps they never suffered like this when they were 13. May God bless you, Mr. TRUAX; I think you are wonderful, next to those two grandest of all other men, my daddy, and that God-fearing man, a miracle man, President Roosevelt.

EXCERPTS FROM MORATORIUM LETTERS

COLUMBUS, OHIO.

It is certainly encouraging to know there is a bill coming up to the House of Representatives to regulate legal theft, known under several names; I believe we call it sometimes "deficiency judgment", "foreclosure", and numerous others. The American citizen is as much a slave to the system as they were to the old debtors' prison, for he is hounded to desperation as long as he has anything to make him feel he is a respectable citizen.

The buying of land for future homes on land contract is one of those evils, if when unable to pay for this land, which in fact he cannot get under any other terms but c.o.d. if judgments can be placed against him, and jeopardizes his other possessions, it seems as if we should have evolved enough to eliminate such a practice.

These methods are killing the landable instinct of home ownership, and even now is being very much discussed in family circles. Thrift and home ownership are being called illusions if it can be swept away at one stroke by financial institutions. There is much food for thought here.

A CITIZEN.

YOUNGSTOWN, OHIO.

More people in Youngstown are commenting upon your fight to force through this moratorium on mortgages than you could imagine.

There are thousands in Youngstown who, through no fault of theirs, find themselves in middle age facing foreclosure proceeding every day.

Some of these have not had any incomes to speak of for the past 2 years, and consequently are back, both in interest and taxes, and all our banks are taking advantage and selling them out.

We see men crazed almost by these conditions, walking the streets all night long, with murder in their hearts, due to the fact that they are powerless in this crisis.

Youngstown, being an industrial town, is especially hard hit. The banks have been helped, railroads financed, insurance companies getting a moratorium, but the father of the family can find no solution to his problem.

Revolution here is just as possible as it was in Russia when the people are goaded too far.

It is all very well for those in Washington, secure in the knowledge that they have ample, to advise others to be patient, but the "masses" have been patiently waiting over 3 years for help and have had none.

Thank God we have one (yourself) representing us.

ONE OF THE UNEMPLOYED.

Have been watching the proceedings of Congress since March 4 with much interest, and looks as if there might be a better day coming, especially for the farmer.

In regards to a moratorium on farm mortgages, think it is very necessary that some action along this line be taken. Unless there is, farm after farm will have to be abandoned on account of inability of farmers to raise money at present-price levels.

Mr. Hoover signed bill granting a moratorium on Federal land-bank loans, but this should have included joint-stock land-bank loans also.

The receiver of one of the largest joint-stock land banks located in Chicago, capitalized at $40,000,000, has issued a moratorium on all of their loans for 2 years. It seems to me that since the Federal land bank and the joint-stock land bank of Chicago have allowed these terms, it would be no more than fair that a law be passed to make all farm loans of such nature come under the same ruling, which would eliminate class legislation, which we cannot help but have under these present rulings. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act was no doubt beneficial to those organizations, which it was intended to help, but left the farmer out in the cold to work out his own salvation.

If an appropriation could be made by Government to take over these loans at a reduced rate which could be possible by eliminating these agencies which have been in it solely for profit and not interested directly in the borrower. There is no reason why the farmer should not be allowed the use of Government money at a rate lower than charged by corporations. We are directly interested in any legislation along this line, since we have a loan from one of the joint-stock land banks.

On the question of farm difficulties, looking to relief, there should be no relaxation. Farmers must now strike, while it is opportune, that they may get themselves rightly placed in agricultural and economic demands, in advance of the time which is now upon us, and not find themselves suffering from visionary impositions by those who will argue that prosperity is here, and no attention need be paid to their pleadings. You, of course, know how these things work if those in industry could now effect an impression upon Congress that no further attention need be given agriculture because of a hope in the minds of our people, might effect them adversely over the future.

Now, this home is about to be foreclosed by one of the large insurance companies which has borrowed money from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. This bill is designed to prohibit farm and home foreclosures and confiscation of real property by financial institutions that borrow money from the Government under the provisions of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act. This bill I am proposing states:

Every applicant for a loan under this act shall, as a condition precedent thereto, file a statement that no farm or real property on which the applicant holds a mortgage, shall be foreclosed because of a default in the payment of either principal or interest, or of taxes, the nonpayment of which constitutes a default under such mortgage, during the period for which the loan applied for shall be in effect.

In other words, gentlemen, are we to lend money to these financial institutions for the purpose of selling out and confiscating the homes of the people who pay the taxes?

Back in 1878 Mr. Carlisle said there were only two classes of people in this country, the laborers, the farmers—the workers who create all of the wealth and pay all of the taxes—and the idle holders of idle capital. Today we still have these two classes, and never were the lines of demarcation so clearly defined as now. The question which you must decide is which side will you be on, upon the side of the struggling masses or upon the side of the idle holders of idle capital. You say to us to plead with these money merchants, these money lenders. We say that we have been to them, and their reply was, "Pay up the usurious interest you owe." We entreated with them, and they answered, "Give us our pound of flesh."

And we have begged of them, and they said, "Like the vampire bats, we will suck the blood from your veins by taking deficiency judgments, too."

And so, Mr. Chairman, I say let us save these homes, let us save these little children, for, as the poet has said, the tone of eloquence may paint pictures of thought on the canvas of ideality, the painter's brush may depict in glowing colors the beauty of man's attachment for man, the poetic muse may lend her charming evidence to the voice of the world to teach us brotherhood and good will, but no more superb principles were ever given to mankind than that of owning and maintaining a happy, contented home. This spirit of home environment, home training, and home influence, like the great sea, has ebbed and flowed throughout all the centuries, beating its countless waves of hope and joy against the shores of time and the sands of eternity. And I would remind you gentlemen that when 400 desperate farmers out on the rolling prairies of Iowa go into the court and drag a judge off his bench and twice attempt to hang him, it is time for this Congress to stop, look, and listen and not refuse longer to grant these people their reprieve, their extension.

They seek not a cancelation or a repudiation of these debts. They merely seek an extension of time until by the products from their farms, by their labors when they are reemployed, they may pay off these mortgages, they may pay off these debts and pay the interest and the taxes thereon.

Why, Mr. Chairman, I submit to you that these men, just 13 years ago, were the real aristocrats of this country, the landed aristocracy, the Knights of Nature's Nobility.

Mr. CLAIBORNE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TRUAX. I yield.

Mr. CLAIBORNE. And, today, they are the welchers of the country, are they not?

Mr. TRUAX. I deny that statement. I say they are the victims today of the wet-nursing of the gentleman's minority party for the past 12 years of every industry save agriculture. [Applause.]

Mr. CLAIBORNE. I am a Democrat, but I believe in personal property.

Mr. TRUAX. Does the gentleman believe in property rights over human rights?

Mr. CLAIBORNE. I cannot see any conflict.

Mr. TRUAX. I say that the confiscation of American homes and farms is the most brazen and arrogant form of property rights over human rights in this country. [Applause.]

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. McKEOWN].

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, there has been a good deal said here this afternoon in regard to artificial legislation affecting the natural laws of economics. Why, Mr. Chairman, the natural laws of economics have hardly had a chance to function in the history of legislation. The creation of money or the fixing of the value of money is an artificiality by which a medium of exchange is to take the place of bargaining. It takes the place of the old process by which we exchanged products for products, like we used to trade coon skins for merchandise in the stores.

They talk about the World War being entirely responsible for the present depression. I want to remind the gentlemen of this committee that three fourths of the people of the world are engaged either in agriculture or in the production of raw products from the mines and the forests and the fisheries of the world. Three fourths of the people in the world today produce their products at less than cost.

Only five nations in the world have any gold to speak of, and five nations of the world have three fourths of all the gold in the world.

Settlements between nations are made by gold in the balancing of trade. Gold is either earmarked for trade or it is shipped from one country to another to balance trade.

The great cotton crop of the United States for 40 years represented the balance of trade between the United States and the European nations. Today there is not sufficient gold in the rest of the world to carry on the commerce of the world. They say they owe us debts which they cannot pay because they have not the gold to pay them with. I want to say here that when the President of the United States, through his Secretary of State, told the debt-paying nations of the world we were willing to accept the next payment in silver, he was taking a step along the right road to bring back world prosperity. Why? Because silver has been the index commodity price and wheat follows silver up and down in its fluctuations in the world market.

I believe we should take silver as a commodity, fixed and based upon a gold standard, and when we do this, then we can afford to say to the foreign countries, "We will allow you more than the present market price because by so doing we lift the price of silver the world over." The minute we lift the price of silver the world over we bring up the value of the money in the Latin American countries, China, and the Far East to a parity where they can buy American goods, then we are going to open the markets of the world and we are going to have world-wide prosperity commence. It would be a startling thing to the reactionaries if the Democrats got prosperity started in this country and all over the world at the same time, but that is what is likely to happen if the President keeps going as he is doing now.

You can go to Mexico and you can get three silver dollars for an American paper dollar. I was down there recently and for a $5 bill I got 15 silver pesos or dollars.

The Mexican cannot trade with us, because his silver money will not buy in this country in the same proportion as it did in former days. If the foreign countries will pay us in silver, they cannot pay us over $500,000,000 in silver, because they cannot get it. There is not any more than that in the world to be gotten hold of and brought here. So there is no danger of the United States suffering from an overproduction of silver. There are only about 34,000,000 ounces of silver produced annually in the United States, and if we would say to the debtor nations, "If you will bring us your silver, we will allow you for it on a gold basis and buy it as a commodity and give you 50 or 60 or even up to 75 cents for it", we would then raise the price of silver over the entire world.

We would also open the markets of China and the Orient, and I may say here that China is one of the few countries that really cares for the United States and really desires to do business with us, because we had sense enough under former administrations to agree that we would take part of the Boxer indemnity and educate their boys in the United States with it; and the best money that the United States could spend today would be to take some of the money that these other countries owe us and let them bring their boys to this country and educate them here.

If we could take these boys from Latin America and bring them to this country, educate them as business men, they would naturally turn to us because they would have a real conception of the American people.

I want to say to you that if they get a conception of the American people it will be different from what they get from the tourists of this country. The tourists have gone abroad with many millions of dollars and by their extravagance and boasting brought this country and the American people into disrepute. If you brought these boys here to see the real American citizens they would appreciate the purpose and intent of our people.

I want to tell you another thing. If we could bring the Mexican boys over here it would not be very long before the bonds of real friendship would be realized.

During my travels in Mexico I was riding over a very bad road, and some of the roads are bad there, I broke down and had to camp. I sent over to a Mexican who had a hacienda nearby, and he sent to me water and milk, and I wondered why he was so friendly. He came to the camp and said to me that he had a boy up at Columbia, Mo., where he was educating him, and anything on earth he could do for me he would be glad to do.

So I want to insist that the United States Government accept from foreign countries all the silver they will pay us and then put it in the Treasury on the gold-standard basis and if necessary we can get our salaries in silver certificates.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKEOWN. I yield.

Mr. KNUTSON. Would the gentleman credit the foreign countries with the silver they gave us at the present market value?

Mr. McKEOWN. I would raise it enough so that they would bring more in.

Mr. KNUTSON. That would be a rebate, would it not?

Mr. McKEOWN. It would be a rebate, but we could take all the silver they would give us.

Mr. KNUTSON. The gentleman stated that there was only $600,000,000 of silver in the world.

Mr. McKEOWN. I said they could not bring more than $500,000,000 worth.

Mr. MOTT. Does the gentleman believe in the free coinage of silver?

Mr. McKEOWN. To this extent—if we are unable to live under the gold standard, if we could bring in one standard and use silver with gold coin—you do not have to have a double standard, but have one standard and coin silver freely, I would be in favor of that.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. SWANK].

Mr. SWANK. Mr. Chairman, I have asked for this time to announce to the Membership that I have filed a motion to discharge the Committee on Agriculture from further consideration of the bill H.R. 2855, which is commonly known as the "Frazier bill", introduced in the House by the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. LEMKE]. The bill provides for refinancing farm loans and that the money shall be derived by the issuance of 1½-percent bonds, which if not sold, and they will not be sold at that rate, will be presented by the Federal Farm Loan Board to the Federal Reserve Board as a basis for issuing Federal Reserve notes to loan direct to the farmers. The bill provides that such loans shall be made at a rate of 1½-percent interest and 1½-percent principal per annum.

I am informed that the legislatures of 20 States have passed resolutions memorializing Congress to pass this bill. The motion is now on the Clerk's desk, and all Members of the House interested in the bill who agree with me that it should be enacted into law now have an opportunity to sign the motion and bring the bill before the House for consideration. I would like to see the bill enacted for the benefit of our farmers and the country.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, there are five gentlemen to whom I have promised time. I want to say that if they will be here tomorrow promptly after the reading of the Journal, I will give them the time.

Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. McREYNOLDS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee had had under consideration the bill H.R. 5390, the third deficiency bill for 1933, and had come to no resolution thereon.

FURTHER MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A further message from the Senate, by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate insists upon its amendments to the bill (H.R. 4606) entitled "An act to provide for cooperation by the Federal Government with the several States and Territories and the District of Columbia in relieving the hardship and suffering caused by unemployment, and for other purposes", disagreed to by the House; agrees to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. FLETCHER, Mr. WAGNER, and Mr. NORBECK to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. HIGGINS, indefinitely, on account of illness in family.

To Mr. HAMILTON, for the remainder of the week, on account of important business.

To Mr. FARLEY, for 3 days, on account of death in family.

Your memorialist, the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska, respectfully represents that:

Whereas there are approximately 200 islands along the shores of southeast and southwest Alaska, occupied by citizens of the United States under permit from the Forestry Bureau or the Department of the Interior, and used for the purpose of propagation of blue foxes and other fur-bearing animals; and

Whereas the value of the permanent improvements on the islands so leased is of a similar nature and generally equal to that required to be done by homesteaders on the mainland before patent is issued; and

Whereas the average annual production of blue-fox pelts alone is approximately 8,000, equal in value to a like number of beef cattle of the same age; and

Whereas it is the expressed desire of the Federal Government to assist and encourage permanent settlement of the Territory of Alaska and the system of leasing referred to has the effect of discouraging such settlement; and

Whereas the act of Congress of July 8, 1916, expressly excepts from the benefits of the homestead laws, islands leased or occupied for the propagation of foxes, and Congress has, in order to assist and encourage the settlement of unoccupied lands in the United States, provided for stock-raising homesteads of 640 acres or less by acts of December 29, 1916; June 6, 1924; and March 3, 1925:

Wherefore your memorialist respectfully prays that the act of Congress of July 8, 1916, be amended by striking the exception to the entry of "islands leased or occupied for the propagation of foxes", and that the benefits under the acts of December 29, 1916; June 6, 1924; and March 3, 1925, be extended to the Territory of Alaska.

And your memorialist will ever pray.

Senate Joint Memorial 7 (by the committee on taxation and transportation)

To the President and Congress of the United States:

Whereas there is now pending before Congress a public works bill which provides for the expenditure of public funds on necessary public improvements throughout the United States; and

Whereas there are many public improvements needed in Alaska, the undertaking and completion of which have been delayed only by lack of funds, such as the erection of public buildings at Ketchikan and Anchorage; dredging of Sitka Harbor; completion of Petersburg Harbor project; completion of road to Indian industrial school at Shoemaker Bay near Wrangell; deepening of Tongas Basin at Ketchikan; flood control of the Salmon River at Hyder and flood control at Seward and Valdez and Egegik Rapids; the construction of a bridge across Gastineau Channel, connecting the towns of Juneau and Douglas; improvement and completion of the Alaska Railroad and its extension and all highways under the jurisdiction of the Department of the Interior; the construction of the international highway from a point on the Richardson Highway up the Tanana River to the Canadian boundary; construction of wagon roads as feeders to the Alaska Railroad, including the Yukon-Kuskokwim Highway, the Fairbanks-Livengood Highway, and all uncompleted projects of the Alaska Road Commission; construction of boat harbor and airplane landing fields at Cordova; establishment of naval seaplane base at Anchorage; Anchorage-Matanuska Road; completion of the Nome Harbor; construction of roads in the second division; aviation fields and water landing facilities at Fairbanks and Nome on the International Airways route from the United States to the Orient; continuation of the geologic land surveys in Alaska; and many other similar public projects throughout the Territory:

Now, therefore, we, your memorialists, respectively petition that the provisions of the public works bill hereinabove mentioned be applied to the Territory of Alaska, and that sufficient amount of the funds appropriated to carry out the provisions of said bill be allotted to the necessary projects mentioned herein and others to be designated by the Delegate to Congress from Alaska.

And your memorialists will ever pray.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Florida, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads:

Senate Concurrent Resolution 12

Whereas the Legislature of the State of Florida by joint resolution in 1929 memorialized Congress, the Federal Bureau of Public Roads and the State Road Department of Florida to use every possible effort to federalize the Gulf Coast Highway, which is legally known as "State Roads 10, 15, and 115"; and

Whereas the resolution referred to above has only been partially carried out; and

Whereas the State of Florida and the counties of the Gulf coast of Florida have spent approximately $15,000,000 and the funds of both the State and counties are now exhausted; and

Whereas all of the Gulf coast counties and cities and civic bodies have passed resolutions setting forth the necessity for continuing the construction of the Gulf Coast Highway in order to relieve the distressing unemployment situation in the Gulf coast counties and cities owing to the serious decline in the oyster, fishing, and other businesses peculiar to these counties and cities; and

Whereas the State road system of Florida cannot be properly rounded out and completed nor can the hundreds of millions of dollars invested therein begin to pay a full return on this investment until the Gulf Coast Highway is completed; and

Whereas the construction of the Gulf Coast Highway has been officially declared of military and strategic importance to the United States Government; and

Whereas the public works committee now arranging the public works program for President Roosevelt has the authority and power to include in said program the construction of Federal roads; and

Whereas road construction in Florida will provide work for the relief of unemployment both in direct employment and in the manufacture and transportation of Florida road-building material: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of the State of Florida (the house of representatives concurring). That the public works committee of President Roosevelt, the Federal Bureau of Public Works, our Senators and Congressmen in Washington, the Governor of Florida, and the State road department, are hereby requested to secure the immediate federalization of all of the Gulf Coast Highway and to use every effort at their command to allocate funds to Florida for the immediate construction of the Gulf Coast Highway in this State; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded by the secretary of the State of Florida, under the great seal of the State of Florida in due form to the Congress of the United States, and the several Members thereof from Florida, to the Governor of Florida and to the State road department.

Approved by the Governor of Florida May 2, 1933.

STATE OF FLORIDA,

Office Secretary of State, ss.:

House Joint Resolution 13

Whereas it has been recently shown that it is practical to manufacture ethyl alcohol from corn, wheat, rye, oats, barley, potatoes, beets, and other agricultural products; and

Whereas if all petroleum products that are used as motor fuel in internal-combustion engines were blended 10 percent by volume with ethyl alcohol, such engines would perform more ideally, carbon and compression knocks would be eliminated, and a maximum of motor acceleration secured; and

Whereas it is difficult and practically impossible because of the present provisions of the Federal law to produce ethyl alcohol in this manner; and

Whereas if the total amount of motor fuel consumed in this country each year were diluted 10 percent by volume with ethyl alcohol it would take 680,000,000 bushels of corn, or 750,000,000 bushels of wheat to produce the necessary amount of such alcohol; and

Whereas the use of agricultural products for the making of motor fuel would create a new market for agricultural surpluses and aid greatly in bringing prosperity back to the farmer, as it is estimated that the total surplus of our corn and wheat crop could be profitably used in this manner: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the Fifty-eighth General Assembly of the State of Illinois (the senate concurring herein), That the President of the United States and the Congress of the United States be urged to enact laws to encourage the manufacture of ethyl alcohol from agricultural products and remove restrictions on the manufacture of ethyl alcohol from agricultural products for motor-fuel uses; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be immediately forwarded to the President of the United States, the President of the Senate, and the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, and to each Congressman and Senator from Illinois; and be it further

Resolved, That the Governor of this State assist the agricultural interests of this State in any way he deems advisable in securing the passage of the desired Federal legislation.

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

House Joint Resolution 35

Whereas the return of national prosperity depends in a large measure on agricultural conditions; and

Whereas the President of the United States has requested Congress to enact legislation and provide an adequate appropriation for the refinancing of farm loans; and

Whereas the refinancing of farm loans will rehabilitate the agricultural industry: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the house of representatives of the fifty-eighth general assembly (the senate concurring therein), That the General Assembly of Illinois congratulates the President of the United States upon his program for the relief of agriculture and urges the Congress to cooperate with the President in putting into effect the program; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this preamble and resolution be sent forthwith to the President of the United States, the President of the Senate, and the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate resolutions adopted by the Common Council of the City of Racine, Wis., favoring the passage of legislation authorizing municipalities to receive cash from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation or other Federal agency at a rate of interest not to exceed 3 percent per annum by putting up delinquent real estate taxes as security for the repayment of such sums, which were referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

TREATMENT OF THE JEWS IN GERMANY

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, the Beth-El Men's Club, a Temple affiliated organization composed of 250 men, located in Indianapolis, Ind., adopted a resolution protesting against the treatment of Jews in Germany. They have sent me a copy of the resolution, and I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed in the RECORD and appropriately referred.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To the Honorable ARTHUR R. ROBINSON:

The Beth-El Men's Club, a Temple affiliated organization composed of 250 men, located in Indianapolis, Ind., presents the following resolution to you, our Senator in the Congress of the United States:

"Be it resolved, That the Beth-El Men's Club solemnly and fervently declares, as the club expression, protest, and horror at the deliberate policy of the German Government; who, by legal and illegal restrictions and degradations, is crushing and terrorizing the 600,000 Jews of Germany, whose only crime is that they were born Jews, and isolating them from the cultural, economic, and professional life of their native land.

"That the Beth-El Men's Club petitions you to express its sentiments in contributing toward and influencing the expression of an official protest of the Government of the United States against such barbarous behavior by a modern civilized nation.

"That the Beth-El Men's Club petitions you to lend your influence and to view favorably a temporary loosening of immigration restrictions from Germany so as to permit refugees from religious intolerance a haven within our United States."

Respectfully submitted.

FORT D. A. RUSSELL, MARFA, TEX.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I present a concurrent resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Texas in reference to the retention of Fort D. A. Russell, and ask that it may be appropriately referred and printed in the RECORD.

The concurrent resolution was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senate Concurrent Resolution 27

Whereas for some 14 years the War Department of the United States maintained Fort D. A. Russell, a military outpost of considerable importance because of its strategic location as a protection for many miles of territory bordering the Republic of Mexico; and

Whereas the climate of the area in the Davis Mountains in which was located this historic fort is such as to provide all-year-round facilities for the training of soldiers in the service of our country, who perform a duty the value of which is unlimited; and

Whereas with the beginning of this year, 1933, the said Fort D. A. Russell, at Marfa, Tex., was abandoned and deserted by the War Department by transferring its personnel, which was composed of a Cavalry unit, to Kentucky for the purpose of having it motorized; and

Whereas there now remains on the site of this fort sufficient equipment and buildings to reestablish to good effect the military post which for so long so ably protected from invasion by neighboring foreigners many miles of valuable property; and

Whereas since the 1st of January 1933 five raids of such magnitude as to create much fear and unrest among residents of the border section adjacent to Mexico have been made upon the property herewith enumerated—the Chinata ranch, January 22; the Jake Baldwin ranch, February 8; the Jack Rawls ranch, February 25; the J. L. Sublett ranch, March 2; and the L. C. Brite ranch, March 3—all of which is confined within the bounds of Presidio County, which in territorial extent embodies an area comparable in size to the combined States of Rhode Island and Delaware; and

Whereas with the abandonment of Fort D. A. Russell the protecting buffer for huge distances along the Mexican border has been removed and hundreds of miles of territory are now without protection, and as a direct result this portion of Texas—the southwestern boundary of the United States—is in a state of considerable demoralization because of the absence of the influence exerted by a unit of the military sufficient in size to adequately protect the life and property of its citizens: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of the State of Texas (the house of representatives concurring), That the Honorable George H. Dern, Secretary of War, Washington, D.C., be petitioned to restore and to reestablish this most important military post at Marfa, Tex.; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent the Honorable George H. Dern, Secretary of War, and the Honorable John Nance Garner, Vice President of the United States.

RESOLUTIONS BY RUFUS SHELTON POST, AMERICAN LEGION, OF HONEY GROVE, TEX.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD and appropriately referred resolutions adopted by the Rufus Shelton Post, No. 247, American Legion, of Honey Grove, Tex., with reference to several legislative proposals.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HONEY GROVE, TEX., April 16, 1933.

Whereas the present 3-cent postage rate has reduced postal business in first-class mail to such an extent that the rates should be reduced; and

Whereas saving has been made a key word in the Democratic administration; and

Whereas war-risk insurance was a contract between the United States Government and the soldier in the World War, for which he paid his money; and

Whereas there is a universal demand for inflation of the United States currency, so that it will be distributed among the masses: Be it

Resolved, That we, the Rufus Shelton Post, No. 247, American Legion, of Honey Grove, Tex., do hereby memorialize the Congress of the United States to reduce first-class postage to 2 cents; and be it further

Resolved, That the Congress of the United States place a tax upon all tax-free Government obligations, meaning tax-free bonds; and be it further

Resolved, That the Congress of the United States pass suitable legislation so that all World War veterans who are totally and permanently disabled, while their war-risk insurance is in force or was in force, may be able to file claims for the benefits for which they paid in blood and money, and in the event of unfavorable action by the Veterans' Administration, shall have the right of court action in a court of suitable jurisdiction, so that this insurance contract shall be carried out in its entirety; and be it further

Resolved, That the Congress of the United States pass the necessary legislation so that the bonus may be paid on the basis of the full face value of the adjusted-compensation certificates at once.

LEGION, OF HONEY GROVE, TEX.

INVESTIGATION OF OPERATIONS OF RECONSTRUCTION FINANCE CORPORATION

Mr. FLETCHER. By direction of the Committee on Banking and Currency, I report an original resolution and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The legislative clerk read the resolution (S.Res. 69), as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Banking and Currency, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to investigate from time to time the operations of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, the status of its affairs, and the procedure adopted by it in passing upon applications for loans, and to investigate particularly (1) any loan heretofore or hereafter made by the Corporation, and (2) any application for a loan heretofore or hereafter made to the Corporation. The committee shall report from time to time to the Senate the results of its investigations, together with its recommendations, if any, for legislation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Florida asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I have not had any opportunity to know what is in the resolution and what is desired to be accomplished by it.

Mr. FLETCHER. I will say to the Senator that the view of the committee in discussing the situation was that, as it had some communications from time to time in reference to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, it ought to have express authority of the Senate to make inquiry of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and to look into the operations and procedure of that organization. That is all the resolution proposes, a general authority upon the part of the Senate to enable the committee to inquire of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation respecting their procedure and operations, and to consider such matters as may be worth while and report them to the Senate if we find anything that should be reported.

Mr. FESS. Cannot any Senator do that without the adoption of a resolution?

Mr. FLETCHER. It was thought not. That suggestion was made—that it could probably be done anyway—but it was thought by the committee that they ought to have authority in the Senate to make any inquiry they might want to make.

Mr. FESS. Was there any objection in the committee to the resolution?

Mr. FLETCHER. No; the action on the part of the committee was unanimous.

Mr. FESS. I have no objection.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, what is the request of the Senator from Florida?

Mr. FLETCHER. I have asked for the consideration of a resolution authorizing the Committee on Banking and Currency to make inquiry respecting the transactions and operations of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. It grants general authority.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and agreed to.

GOVERNMENT OF AMERICAN SAMOA

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill providing a government for American Samoa and ask that it be referred to the appropriate committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 1574) to provide a government for American Samoa was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, in connection with the bill just introduced by me I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a very short but comprehensive report upon the subject of granting a local government to American Samoa.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Senate Report No. 195, Seventy-second Congress, first session]

GOVERNMENT FOR AMERICAN SAMOA

Mr. Bingham, from the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs, submitted the following report (to accompany S. 417):

The Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 417) to provide a government for American Samoa, having considered the same, reports favorably thereon and recommends that the bill do pass.

This bill carries out the recommendations, as embodied in Senate Document No. 249, Seventy-first Congress, of the American Samoan Commission, appointed under authority of Public Resolution No. 89, Seventieth Congress, "To provide for accepting, ratifying, and confirming the cessions of certain islands of the Samoan group to the United States, and for other purposes", approved February 20, 1929, and Public Resolution No. 3, Seventy-first Congress, approved May 22, 1929, amendatory thereof.

In brief, the bill provides that the people of American Samoa shall make their own laws, subject to the veto of the Governor, and with the right of appeal to the President of the United States, if they choose to override the Governor's veto. The bill gives them American citizenship and grants them the right of appeal in all important legal cases to the Federal District Court in Honolulu, Territory of Hawaii. The proposed organic act sets up a very considerable measure of self-government for the people of American Samoa, which is made as flexible as possible so as to allow them to develop themselves, should they choose, away from their present communal system of social organization and property into one more completely in tune with American civilization, and at the same time permitting them to maintain such native customs not in conflict therewith which they may wish to preserve. The bill of rights which it embodies has been phrased as near as may be in consonance with the language of the Constitution on those subjects calculated to afford protection to the individual, without doing violence to long-established native institutions.

In short, the bill gives to these islands in the South Seas a provincial status as a body politic, with its own bill of rights as its guaranty of personal liberties and with a continuation of its present organization of government changed only in two important matters; first, by removing from the Governor all judicial power and legislative authority except the veto and the initiation of legislation, and, second, by abolishing the office of the secretary of native affairs and providing for a chief justice, independent of the Governor, to perform all the judicial functions of that former office, and for an attorney general to perform the other duties thereof. It is provided that the Governor, attorney general, and chief justice shall be appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States, the first two to hold office at the pleasure of the President, and the chief justice for a term of 4 years.

Prior to the year 1900 the people of American Samoa governed themselves. They have never been conquered. They were independent, but some 30 years ago, in view of the annexation of various groups of islands in the Pacific by Germany and Great Britain, the chiefs of these islands turned to the United States and asked us to take them over. The United States was allotted the suzerainty over the islands of eastern Samoa, but practically nothing was done about it by our Government except that President McKinley authorized the Navy to govern them as a naval station. Two years ago the Congress accepted the offer so long ago made by the chiefs, and by the resolution previously referred to in this report authorized the President to appoint a commission, consisting of 2 Members of the Senate and 2 Members of the House of Representatives and 3 native chiefs, to recommend legislation in the interests of these people. The American members of this commission visited the islands of eastern Samoa last September, and a few weeks ago the commission presented its report to the Congress.

Under the generally highly beneficent rule of the Navy important changes in native culture and thought during the span of a generation have taken place, and have reached a point where, your committee believes, the people of American Samoa are entitled to have their own form of government. Careful study has been given to the recommendations of the American Samoan Commission as embodied in the bill which is the subject of this report, and your committee strongly urges the passage of the bill during the present session.

The following excerpt from the report of the American Samoan Commission affords a historical, geographical, and ethnological view of the islands of eastern, or American, Samoa and their interesting people:

"The islands of American Samoa from east to west are Rose Island, Tau, Olosega, Ofu, Aunu'u, and Tutuila, with Swains Island distant 207 miles northward of Tutuila. Rose Island is a coral atoll, uninhabited. Swains Island is a low coral island not over 20 feet in elevation, with a population of 98 persons engaged in producing copra from about 800 acres of coconuts. The others are high islands of volcanic origin. The islands of Tau, Olosega, and Ofu are known as the 'Manua Group', and the island of Aunu'u is included generally in the name 'Tutuila.' The sovereignty of the United States was extended to Swains Island and the island made a part of American Samoa by a joint resolution of Congress approved March 4, 1925.

"The largest island, Tutuila, of irregular shape, with an area estimated at 40.2 square miles, is about 17 miles long and nearly 6 miles wide in the widest part, and is situated about 14° south of the Equator. It is distant from Honolulu 2,275 miles, from San Diego 4,190 miles, from San Francisco 4,150 miles, from New Zealand 1,565 miles, from Fiji 638 miles, from Guam 3,159 miles, from Manila 4,505 miles, and from Apia, in western Samoa, 80 miles. A rugged ridge extends nearly the entire length of the island. What little level land there is lies at the foot of the mountains along the coast, except along the southwestern part of the island, where there is a plain devoted to coconut plantings. The mountains are heavily wooded and the island right to the water's edge is a mass of foliage of rare tropical luxuriance. Pagopago Bay, 'the safest and best harbor in the South Seas', cuts the island nearly in two and, because of its shape, affords to ships smooth water during the heavier weather. On the bay is the old village of Pagopago and the naval station. Fagatoga lies behind the naval station. The harbor with its two wharves is well buoyed, but lighted dimly. Other harbors of some importance are Leone and Fagaitua on the south side and Fagasa and Masefau on the north side, all of little value except Leone. The highest point on Tutuila is Matafao, 2,141 feet in elevation.

"Tau, 67.5 miles east of Tutuila, 14 square miles in area, rises like a huge cone to an elevation of nearly 3,000 feet. It has no harbor, but has one good anchorage. Olosega and Ofu, with a combined area of 3.7 square miles, are separated from Tau by a channel 6 miles wide. Both are rugged and mountainous.

"Natural passages to the landing beaches through the coral reefs have been widened by blasting. These need much improvement, however, before they can be relied upon for safety. On none of the islands are there any sizable tracts of unemployed arable land.

"The climate is tropical and equable, the temperature ranging from an average of 82.28° in February to an average of 80.21° in July. The humidity is always high and the rainfall heavy, the annual average for 26 years being 197.15 inches. Hurricanes of great violence have occurred at intervals of about 10 years.

"With the possible exception of Rose Island, there is no 'public' land, as that term is generally employed. Claimants exist for land even in the seemingly inaccessible portions, for even to those areas persons penetrate for the gathering of fiber plants, dyes, land crabs, and other products of the forests.

"The native inhabitants, racially considered, are Polynesians, cousins of the Maoris of New Zealand and the Hawaiians of the Territory of Hawaii. The ethnologists of the Bishop Museum testified that the Polynesian race is a mixed race, with two elements predominant, Caucasoid and Mongoloid. There are no Negroid elements in the race. Their faces, of a light brown, have many distinctive marks of the European. The Samoan man is well formed, erect in bearing, with straight nose, chin firm and strong, forehead high, and hair black and soft, sometimes wavy. The women mature and age early. They do not preserve their early promise to the middle years as do the men. The 1930 census reported a total population of 10,055 souls, distributed as follows: Tutuila, 7,809; Tau, 1,243; Ofu, 466; Olosega, 438; Swains Island, 98. Of this number the number of white persons, excluding the 179 Navy personnel but including missionaries, is 45, and the number of half-castes, part Samoans and mixed bloods, is 818. The last figure includes the following mixed bloods: Part Japanese, 25; part Filipinos, 8; part Negroes, 8; part Chinese, 7; part Fijian, 6; part Javanese, 3.

"The Samoan social organization was the chieftain system. Each family group elected or selected its own head. His title was that of "matai", and he ruled the family so long as he furnished it efficient leadership. When he became inefficient he was deposed. He held the power of life and death over the group. The semblance of the office remains, although shorn of this arbitrary power. Today the family group discusses matters, led by the matai. No votes are taken. Conclusions are reached after much deliberation, and when once arrived at the matai speaks for the family group. Originally the family lands were worked by the family and practically everything was owned in common, as it were, used and consumed by those who required it. There was under this system no incentive to effort on the part of the individual. Thrift brought no reward. However, 30 years of contact with American civilization has weakened this communal organization. The idea of personal property owned by the individual has infiltrated deeply. There are complaints from those not matais that the leadership of old is lacking and that it is not practical now to depose a matai. The schools have hastened the new ideas. The children are oriented away from the old culture. The thinkers among the chiefs wish the best for their children, but admit that the changes have come and that sooner or later much of the old order will go. They look at these changes regretfully, but turn with hope and confidence to the possibilities of the future.

"The chiefs of Samoa are courteous gentlemen of great personal dignity, perfect hosts, living in a society nearly free from industrialism, where food is abundant and nature prodigal in her beauty. They love to entertain—with speeches full of high-sounding phrases and Biblical references, with songs in chorus and dances, with elaborate presentations of food and gifts, and, above all, with the ceremonies of kava drinking in which their rank is recognized by the order of service of the cup. The thing of greatest prize to a chief is his title and the status it affords. They love the 'malaga' or journey of ceremony, now curbed by law. It is becoming increasingly difficult for them to do these things.

"The only newspaper is the Government sheet O le Fa'atonu, used chiefly to proclaim notices of various kinds. Every village has one or more churches. Christianity came to Samoa in 1830. Most of the Samoans are church members, and nearly everybody goes to church. Family prayers are the rule, and Sunday is a day of rest. The people are intelligent, amiable, and hospitable to a remarkable degree. Every head matai is supposed to have a guest house.

"There are no factories. Every family can raise or make those things needed for food and shelter. But new wants and appetites are changing this situation. Under the Navy administration the health of the people is good. Contact with the outside world exists through the naval radio station and the triweekly mail steamers.

"The public-school system consists of 21 schools with a teaching staff of 52. Thirteen of these schools complete fourth-grade work, six schools complete sixth-grade work, and two schools complete eighth-grade work. Five of the teachers are white. Education is supposed to be compulsory through the fourth grade, but from 15 to 20 percent of the children of school age do not attend school. All but two of the schools are poorly equipped. Because of the poor pay the best teachers leave the service when opportunity offers.

"Samoa is a one-crop country, and the crop is copra, sold by the Government for the producers. In 1929 the production was 1,687 tons, which sold for $147,215.90. The handling charges less shrinkage were $13,303.09.

"For 1930 there are 2,299 taxpayers. The inventory of island-government assets as of June 30, 1930, stands at $261,365.68, of which sum $174,220 represents the value of land and $72,440 the value of buildings and structures. For the fiscal year ended June 30, 1930, the total expenditures of the island government were $131,929.48, while the receipts were $133,772.05. Of these receipts the native tax department produced $22,091.50 and the customs department $95,739.53."

AMENDMENT GASOLINE TAX BILL—TARIFF ADJUSTMENTS

Mr. HATFIELD submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H.R. 5040) to extend the gasoline tax for 1 year, to modify postage rates on mail matter, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed.

INVESTIGATION OF BANKING OPERATIONS

Mr. FLETCHER submitted the following resolution (S.Res. 70), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That Senate Resolution No. 56, agreed to April 4, 1933, authorizing and directing the Committee on Banking and Currency to make investigations of the business of banking, financing, and extending credit and other practices therein mentioned in addition to the authority contained in Resolution No. 84, agreed to March 4, 1932, hereby is continued in full force and effect until the beginning of the second session of the Seventy-third Congress, and the amount authorized to be expended from the contingent fund of the Senate for above-mentioned purposes hereby is increased $25,000 in addition to the amounts previously authorized to be expended in pursuance of the purposes of such resolutions.

PRINTING OF HEARINGS ON "30-HOUR WORK WEEK"

Mr. BLACK submitted the following resolution (S.Res. 71), which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That in accordance with paragraph 3 of section 2 of the Printing Act approved March 1, 1907, the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate be, and is hereby, empowered to have printed for its use 1,000 additional copies of the hearings held before a subcommittee of said committee relative to "30-hour work week", Seventy-second Congress, second session.

INVESTIGATION OF CONCESSIONS IN FOREIGN COUNTRIES

Mr. WHEELER submitted the following resolution (S.Res. 72), which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

Whereas American investments abroad, already amounting to many billions of dollars, are increasing rapidly, especially since the World War, and are alleged in a number of instances to be conditioned upon unjustifiable concessions from foreign governments which lack capital but desire to develop their resources; and

Whereas such concessions if unjust in their terms endanger legitimate investments abroad; and

Whereas controversies regarding the rights and duties of holders of such concessions constitute an increasingly important part of the foreign relations of this Government and produce tension which has frequently led to armed intervention and may lead to war: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to investigate the terms and conditions under which concessions have been procured in foreign countries by United States citizens and by corporations and other associations in which United States citizens are financially interested, and the nature and extent of such concessions, with particular reference to (1) the source and sanction of such concessions; (2) the record, precedents, and traditions of the Government of the United States in its foreign relations since its establishment, insofar as the rights and duties incident to such concessions constitute the subject matter of international official correspondence; and (3) the principal aspects of public policy involved in the treatment, as property rights for purposes of diplomatic protection, of such concessions.

For the purposes of this resolution such committee or subcommittee is authorized to hold hearings, to sit and act at such times and places, to employ such experts and clerical, stenographic, and other assistants, to require by subpoena or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths and to take such testimony and to make such expenditures as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic service to report such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words. The expenses of such committee or subcommittee shall not exceed $30,000, and shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman of such committee or subcommittee. Such committee or subcommittee shall make a final report to the Senate as to its findings at the beginning of the second session of the Seventy-third Congress.

MUSCLE SHOALS—ATTITUDE OF UNITED STATES CHAMBER OF COMMERCE

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, there was prepared for my use in the debate on the so-called "Muscle Shoals bill" which was passed by the Senate yesterday some information showing the connection of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States with the National Electric Light Association.

It reached me yesterday at a time when I had no opportunity to examine it, and I did not use it. I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

THE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, "BIG BROTHER" OF THE NATIONAL ELECTRIC LIGHT ASSOCIATION

On April 10 President Roosevelt sent a message to Congress urging immediate legislation to carry out his plan for the development of the Tennessee Valley, which involves public ownership and operation of the famous Muscle Shoals plant.

On April 13 President Henry I. Harriman, of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, sent a letter to member chambers throughout the Nation reiterating the policy of the chamber which demands "the Muscle Shoals project should be sold or leased, as is, on the best possible terms." Also, that in the event the Government should decide to operate the generating plants at Muscle Shoals "the Federal Government should always leave the transmission and distribution of power to other agencies"; meaning, of course, to private power companies. It is to be expected as on previous occasions of this sort Senators and Congressmen will be deluged with letters and telegrams from local chambers of commerce urging opposition to the Muscle Shoals bill of Senator NORRIS.

The election of Mr. Harriman to the presidency of the National Chamber of Commerce was supposed to inaugurate a new era in the administration of that body. It is an open secret that thousands of conservative business men and manufacturers have become restive and disgusted with the domination of the affairs of the chamber for the last 13 years by monopolistic big business headed by the utilities, the power combine in particular.

It is surprising, therefore, that although no doubt justified in expressing officially established policy on the Muscle Shoals question which has not been reversed, Mr. Harriman should resort to the same tactics of omission and misrepresentation of facts which has characterized his predecessors since 1920.

For example, in order to alarm the country over the vast amount of the taxpayers' money further to be invested in this project, assumedly at once, Mr. Harriman says:

"An independent governmentally owned primary transmission system for adjacent territory would cost $85,000,000, according to estimates made by the corps of engineers for the Muscle Shoals Commission."

The reference is to the commission appointed by President Hoover and the Governors of Tennessee and Alabama, which made its report November 14, 1931, and was promptly transmitted to Congress where it fell flat because it was well known that every member of the commission was hostile to public operation and its conclusions were foreordained.

There was no "corps of engineers" employed by the commission. One Army engineer, Lt. Col. C. M. Tyler, made two reports to the commission, one The Cost to the Federal Government of Transmitting and Selling Muscle Shoals Power, and the other Economics of Proposed Power Dams, etc.

The findings of this gentleman, however, were not taken seriously because both Senate and House committees a few short months previously had investigated the activities of Colonel Tyler when he was chief engineer of the Federal Power Commission and working in closest harmony with F. E. Bonner, the executive secretary, the two of them being the principal agents in carrying out President Hoover's policy of undermining and wrecking the Federal Water Power Act. The evidence unearthed caused Senator COZZENS, of Michigan, to declare, "It is one of the rottenest exhibitions of government I have ever heard of."

Shockingly enough, Mr. Harriman is not content with the inflated estimates of this engineer. In table V, Estimated Investment in Power Properties (p. 72, Conn. Rept.) Colonel Tyler sets out his annual figures from 1932 to 1946. He arrives in 1946, through ridiculous juggling, at $56,713,000 invested in high voltage transmission lines and substations, which includes $4,650,000 for farm lines. Nowhere does Colonel Tyler estimate $85,000,000 as necessary for "a primary transmission system."

Again, says Mr. Harriman:

"The duplication of public service facilities is uneconomical and must ultimately result in added cost to consumers."

This is a flat misrepresentation of facts of utility history inexcusable in the leading spokesman for American business men, especially for a utility man which Mr. Harriman is. He is challenged to produce a single instance in which municipal competition with private power plants has raised rates. He knows, or ought to know, that such public competition has reduced rates in his own State of Massachusetts; that the small 3-cent plant at Cleveland, Ohio, in the 19 years of its life has forced the Cleveland Illuminating Co. to reduce its domestic rates from 10 cents to, now, 4 cents per kilowatt-hour and has saved "the consumers" of that city at least $40,000,000; that the city light plant of Seattle, Wash., in competition with the Puget Sound Light & Power Co., controlled by the Stone & Webster Co., of Boston, is saving the consumers $10,000,000 annually, to be conservative.

Another case is that of Springfield, Ill., which saves the citizens of that municipality around $650,000 annually, in direct competition with an Insull concern. Such instances could be easily multiplied.

It is submitted that the "business men" and manufacturers of such cities over the Nation are saving millions of dollars annually by reason of public competition and that Mr. Harriman is not serving their best interests by sponsoring this deliberate misstatement of truth long reiterated by Power Trust propagandists. Again, Mr. Harriman says:

"The private properties that are now serving the public in the region of Muscle Shoals were built and are now being operated under public regulation. These would be destroyed by Government competition. A wholly different relation to existing facilities was provided in legislation of New York creating the 'Power Authority of the State of New York' (ch. 772, Apr. 27, 1931) as shown in the following comparisons of provisions contained in these different measures."

The first of these distinctions is that the New York act "offers power at the dam", but bills for the Federal authority "offer power within transmission distance."

After making other distinctions Mr. Harriman goes on to say:

"* * * It would seem only fair and reasonable that industries already established and which have long been engaged in the development of the Muscle Shoals region are entitled to an opportunity to cooperate with the Federal Government under some such law as New York has enacted rather than be faced with Federal competition in their fields, the competition being on a basis which no enterprise can meet. * * * We also desire the devoting of the Muscle Shoals properties to their best use as soon as practicable. I believe, however, that this requires proper safeguards for private business and private investment in both the power and fertilizer fields."

Without being specific, Mr. Harriman here cleverly leaves the reader with the inference that this act, since it was promoted and signed by Governor Roosevelt, embodies his policy as to transmission and distribution. If he desired to be fair to Governor, now President, Roosevelt in interpreting the New York act to American business men and the public, he would have set forth the conditions under which Governor Roosevelt held St. Lawrence power should be sold to private companies for transmission and distribution and resale. But neither Mr. Harriman nor the spokesmen for the power interests and their lobbyists now swarming in Washington deign to mention those conditions.

They are set forth in the first message Governor Roosevelt sent to the New York Legislature on this subject, March 12, 1929. (See Public Papers of Gov. Franklin D. Roosevelt, published by New York State, pp. 153-160.) The Governor said:

"(2) Power developed therefrom shall be transmitted and distributed, if possible, through the employment of private capital, so as to secure adequate distribution throughout the State. This distribution, however, shall secure the lowest rates to consumers compatible with a fair and reasonable return on actual cash outlay; that is to say, operating expenses, capital outlay, representing money actually spent in plant investment and working capital, with reasonable allowance for obsolescence and depreciation and a return on the investment not exceeding the interest actually paid on borrowed money and dividend rates not in excess of current rates on preferred stock and not to exceed 8 percent on all other cash capital. In other words, the power generated by the agency of the State, called the trustees, shall be sold on a contract basis, which will take into definite consideration all the steps between the sale at the power house and the ultimate sale to the home owner or industrial establishment."

More, the Governor appended a bill of his own drafting, in which in sections 3 to 5 thereof he set forth in more exact legal language his idea of not to exceed 8 percent return on "actual cash outlay" in transmission and distribution systems. He went farther and provided:

"The report shall also present the comparative advantages and disadvantages of transmission and distribution of such hydroelectric power through private and public agencies and shall indicate their recommendations in that respect."

In his message he said:

"Are the business men of this State willing to transmit and distribute this latent water power on a fair return on their investment? If not, then the State may have to go into the transmission business itself," which would involve "public ownership and operation not only of the site, the dam, and the power, but of transmission lines and distribution systems as well."

Mr. Harriman knows, or should know, that Governor Roosevelt was unable to secure all that he wanted from a hostile Republican legislature dominated by the utility interests. They yielded on public ownership and operation of the power plant, but balked on public transmission, which is the crux of the Muscle Shoals conflict now raging in Congress.

Mr. Harriman in this letter and all the great power executives in their public statements profess great admiration of and support for the President's Tennessee plan save only transmission and distribution lines operated by the Government and the municipalities—the final thing absolutely necessary to guarantee genuinely cheap electric service to the business men, small manufacturers, and householders of the entire Tennessee region.

President Roosevelt has thus set up what Mr. Harriman says he desires—"proper safeguards for private business and private investment" in power facilities. Let him now state whether he and his colleagues will accept Roosevelt's conditions.

THE CHANGED POLICY

In this letter of April 13, 1933, Mr. Harriman says: "The Chamber of Commerce of the United States in 1930, having learned that the maintenance of the Muscle Shoals properties for the purpose of national defense was no longer necessary, recommended that 'the Muscle Shoals project should be sold or leased, as is, on the best possible terms.' " (Italics ours.)

The inference is that the chamber had taken no action prior to 1930 in respect to Muscle Shoals. This is technically correct as respects any official action on the part of the rank and file of the membership, by which alone a policy may be announced by the directors and officials. It wholly overlooks the fact that for several years, without such authorization by the rank and file, the officials had been conducting a campaign against the Ford offer and against any public operation of Muscle Shoals, Boulder Dam, and public ownership and operation in general. In fact, the rank and file were not consulted on the subject of public ownership of power plants, generally or specifically, until 1930, when a referendum was had.

This brings to light an amazing change in the policy of the president and directors of the national chamber, as well as the more important of its local branches. It should be of interest to the rank and file of competitive business men, as well as the country at large, to know exactly what happened.

ENTER THE UTILITY PROMOTERS

We need at this point to take a brief look at the activities of the National Electric Light Association, trade organization of the electric industry, the company members of which, in 1923, generated around 90 percent of the total national output of power.

Immediately following the World War the activities of this organization were stepped up, and there ensued the greatest era of propaganda, newspaper control, and political activity ever undertaken by any industry in the Nation's history, the railroads not excluded. The root cause of this effort lies in the revolution brought about by the perfection of long-distance transmission, which brought in the superpower system, displaced local generating plants, and cut the production and distribution costs 50 percent, thus causing a new era of stock watering.

In its own house it organized a tremendous central propaganda bureau in New York and established some 28 State "information bureaus", the first being organized in 1919 by Samuel Insull in Chicago. It set up a committee to cooperate with college and university professors. Through millions spent in advertising and by direct purchase it controlled a majority of the newspapers, big and little. It entered politics, local, State, and national, and was squarely behind the elections of Presidents Harding, Coolidge, and Hoover. In short, it aimed to control the thinking and political action of the Nation.

BANKERS COOPERATE

Closely affiliated were all the great banking houses and bankers of the Nation and stock gamblers of every kind.

Outside its own house, it brought influence to bear so that its policies, catch words, and misinformation as to electrical service were copied and promulgated by the United States Chamber of Commerce, the American Bar Association, the American Association of Railroad and Utility Commissioners, the American Engineering Council, mechanical and electrical engineering societies, and, of course, the American Bankers Association and the Association of Investment Bankers. It enlisted the support of Herbert Hoover.

In 1927 it organized the "Joint Committee of National Utility Associations", with the Hon. George B. Cortelyou as chairman, through which the electric, gas, and street-railway industries combined and raised a fund of $400,000 specifically to defeat the Senate resolution of the late Senator Thomas J. Walsh for an investigation of the Power Trust; also to defeat the Swing-Johnson Boulder Dam bill and the Norris bill for Muscle Shoals.

All went smoothly until the investigation of the industry by the Federal Trade Commission under the Walsh resolution began in 1928 and with it began the exposé both as to propaganda and financial jugglery. The 1929 stock-market crash followed by the collapse of the House of Insull in 1932 brought general condemnation upon the industry.

From 1920 to 1932 Samuel Insull, of Chicago, and Sidney Z. Mitchell, of Electric Bond & Share Co., dominated the policies of the National Electric Light Association. In 1932-33 the House of Morgan gained control by the election of officers and transformed the association into the Edison Electric Institute, with Floyd L. Carlisle, head of the Niagara-Hudson Power Corporation, in control.

THE OLD AND THE NEW CHAMBER OF COMMERCE

Return now to the United States Chamber of Commerce. Founded in 1912, it was set up as a "democracy of business", in which the rank and file of small competitive business men should have equal or greater voice in determining policies as monopolistic big business. That policy was fairly well followed and the affairs of the chamber were in the hands of business men, per se, who fairly represented the rank and file of competitive business. Since about 1920, however, especially in respect to banking and utility matters, the interests of little business men have been disregarded by bankers and utility men who sought and gained election to the necessary key positions.

WHO IS HENRY I. HARRIMAN?

It is to be feared that Mr. Harriman will not go far in support of Mr. Roosevelt's doctrines, especially when his financial connections are considered. Follows the report of Poor's Register of Directors for 1932:

Bellows Falls Canal Co., president and director; Bellows Falls Power Co., director; Boston Chamber of Commerce, president, chairman executive committee, and director; Boston Chamber of Commerce Realty Trust, trustee; Central Massachusetts Electric Co., director; Fall Mountain Electric Co., president and director; Gardner Electric Light Co., director; Hoosac Tunnel & Wilmington Railroad, vice president and director; Kennebec Co., trustee; Lawrence Gas & Electric Co., director; Lowell Electric Light Corporation, director; Massachusetts Lighting Companies, trustee; Massachusetts Utilities Associates, vice chairman, member executive committee, and trustee; Metropolitan Planning Board, director; New England Power Association, vice chairman of board and executive director; Rhode Island Power Transmission Co., director; Worcester Suburban Electric Co., director; Arthur T. McIntosh Land Association of Chicago, president; The University Club Realty Trust, trustee; New England Trust Co., director; Boston Elevated Railway, chairman of board of public trustees; Metropolitan Transit District of Boston, trustee; Atlantic National Bank, director; L. O. Cattle Co. of Montana, director; Emerald Bay Corporation, director.

HARRIMAN BEFORE THE FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION

"Who's Who on the Board, 1932-33," of the United States Chamber of Commerce gives President Harriman's "predominant business affiliations" as "chairman of the board of the New England Power Association."

The Federal Trade Commission's investigation of this great holding company makes a volume of 1,125 pages. From this we learn that that company controls some 14 other companies and is in turn controlled by the gigantic International Paper & Power Co., of which A. R. Graustein is president. Graustein's attempt to buy up in 1928 a large number of daily newspapers, including several in the South, was halted when his manipulations were exposed by the Trade Commission's investigations. (See S.Doc. 92, pts. 31-32, to which page reference will hereafter be made.)

Mr. Harriman's testimony and cross-examination on March 17, 1931, are illuminating (pp. 248-294). Here we find that back in 1906 Mr. Harriman and Malcolm C. Chace formed a partnership and started in the power business. Later they incorporated under many other names also. Two of their ventures here noted are characteristic. The Deerfield Valley lies on the Massachusetts-Vermont line, and it constitutes a fine power site, developed supposedly by the Deerfield River Power Co., which Chace and Harriman acquired in 1911 from Martin A. Brown and associates at a cost of $14,700. In the end, Chace and Harriman turned these lands and water rights over to the New England Power merger and netted therefrom $454,000 in cash, $300,000 in notes, and $2,500,000 in stock (hearings, p. 71). On the stand, Mr. Harriman's memory suddenly went blank on the history of the Deerfield company or what he paid for it. Forced by Judge McCulloch, presiding, to answer, after a battle royal with the chief counsel, he finally recalled that "there was an understanding with Mr. Brown * * * " (p. 285).

Martin A. Brown was called before the Trade Commission later and testified that in 1907 he had bought up the farm lands of the Deerfield Valley as a nondisclosed agent for Chace and Harriman, and in 1911 the Deerfield company was organized at their instance. A letter from Harriman to Brown, dated March 28, 1911, promised Brown a payment of $14,700, and Brown got his check on April 3, 1911. Brown testified that although there was a reservation of 12,000,000 kilowatt-hours of power for the benefit of the people of that region, they got no benefit from it.

Another instance: In 1906 Chace & Harriman built at Vernon on the Connecticut River a power plant which cost them not over $1,700,000. When juggled through a series of transfers this item was finally written up to a face value of $4,500,000. (Hearings, pp. 259-260.)

Mr. Harriman has exhibited no grief over billions of watered stock on which consumers must pay high rates to maintain dividends, but he professes great concern over further investment of actual cash by the Government at Muscle Shoals, which will insure low rates to the people of the South and set an example for the entire Nation. There's the rub. Not once has he objected to the $150,000,000 Muscle Shoals project being taken over by the power interests at a mere fraction of its real value, which would actually defraud the taxpayers.

As seen, Mr. Harriman continues the policies of his predecessors in the presidency of the United States Chamber of Commerce. It will be instructive to discover just who these presidents were.

PRESIDENTS OF THE UNITED STATES CHAMBER OF COMMERCE, 1920-33, AND THEIR UTILITY CONNECTIONS IN PART

Joseph H. Defrees, Chicago, 1920-22: Lawyer, senior member firm of Defrees, Buckingham & Eaton, utility and corporation lawyers. Buckingham was director and general counsel for the North American Light & Power Co., the Illinois Light & Power Co., etc. Mr. Defrees was an ex-president of the Chicago Chamber of Commerce.

Julius H. Barnes, Duluth and New York, 1922-24: Industrialist and grain dealer, president Barnes-Ames Co., etc. Director J. Henry Schroder Banking Corporation; president United States Food Administration Grain Corporation; also wheat director, etc.

Richard F. Grant, Cleveland and New York, 1924-25: President Lehigh Valley Coal Corporation; director Cleveland Trust Co.; former general counsel and partner Mark A. Hanna & Co., Cleveland, Ohio; former president Cleveland Chamber of Commerce.

John W. O'Leary, Chicago, 1925-27: Banker and utility director; president National Bank of the Republic, since merged with Central Trust Co. under name of Central Republic Bank & Trust Co., of which he is now vice chairman of the board; director Chicago Railway Co., Great Western Railroad Co.; former president Chicago

Association of Commerce; treasurer Illinois State Chamber of Commerce.

Lewis E. Pierson, New York, 1927-28: Banker and utility director; chairman of the board Irving Trust Co.; director and member of the executive committee Electric Bond & Share Co., National Power & Light Co.; director Brooklyn Chamber of Commerce, New York State Chamber of Commerce; past president American Bankers Association and New York State Bankers Association, etc.

William Butterworth, Moline, Ill., 1929-31: Industrialist, banker, and utility director; chairman of the board Deere & Co., Moline, Ill.; president Peoples Saving & Trust Co.; director United Light & Power Co.

Silas H. Strawn, Chicago, 1931-32: Railroad and utility lawyer; senior member Winston, Strawn & Shaw; general solicitor the Alton Railroad; solicitor Michigan Central Railroad; attorney Great Western Railroad, etc.; director Electric Household Utilities Co.; vice president for United States of the International Chamber of Commerce.

Henry I. Harriman, Boston, 1932-33: Power executive; chairman of the board New England Power Association; director or other official of 12 utility or power companies as previously shown.

Hence, the record shows that each one of the presidents of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States since 1920 has had direct affiliation and held official positions with the utility and banking interests. Six of the eight have militantly promoted the program of the Power Trust. Mr. Defrees, one of the founders of the chamber in 1912, was not so pronouncedly pro-utility, while Mr. O'Leary, in his presidential address in 1926 went so far as to say:

"There is a school of economic thought embracing not a small minority of our people which believes that our natural resources should either be controlled by government or operated by government. It is in this field that American business must scrupulously carry on its operations in such a manner that this minority cannot justifiably claim that business is not operated in the public interest."

He mentions water power as a subject of attack. But President O'Leary's warning went unheeded.

BOARD OF DIRECTORS AND DEPARTMENT HEADS

Each of the above gentlemen, as shown by the chamber's record, served on important committees, both before and after reaching the presidency. Each of them automatically has served as a member of the "senior council", which has strong influence in shaping the chamber's policies.

The same records show that several Power Trust officials have held key positions upon the board of directors and as chairman or members of the important committees and departments of the organization, especially those dealing with publicity, utilities, promotion, and natural resources. This will appear later in giving the records of a few of these officials.

REPORTS OF THE ANNUAL MEETINGS OF THE BOARD OF DIRECTORS

A study of the reports of the board of directors, of the resolutions adopted by the annual conventions and of the referenda submitted to the membership over the Nation from 1919 to 1933 discloses scant information concerning and less justification for the strenuous activities of the officials of the chamber in behalf of the Power Trust as shown by the revelations of the power investigation of the Federal Trade Commission and other sources.

The seventh annual meeting of the chamber, May 1, 1919, passed the following resolution:

GOVERNMENT AND BUSINESS

"The very essence of civilization is that there be placed upon the individual only that degree of restraint which shall prevent his encroachment upon the rights of others, thus releasing to the utmost individual initiative in every proper direction.

"Our form of government most effectively expresses and maintains this principle. Within our basic law exists ample provision for such changes as may from time to time be necessary to safeguard our people. It is, therefore, essential that our Government should scrupulously refrain from entering any of the fields of transportation, communication, industry, and commerce, or any phase of business, when it can be successfully undertaken and conducted by private enterprise. Any tendency of government to enter such fields should be carefully weighed in the light of its possible effect upon the very genius of our institutions."

Under the constitution of the organization, no action could be lawfully taken by the national officials in respect to such concrete problems as Muscle Shoals, Boulder Dam, and the St. Lawrence under this general statement without first submitting a proposed definite policy to a referendum vote of the entire membership. Yet under the cover of this vague declaration, never submitted to the membership and passed just 2 years after Lewis E. Pierson, banker and director of the Electric Bond & Share Co., of New York, was elected to the board of directors, Pierson, Philip H. Gadsden, Matthew S. Sloan, all major utility executives, and Julius H. Barnes and Merle Thorpe, editor of Nation's Business, have thrown the chamber into the fight on the side of the Power Trust. It was not until 1930 that a proper referendum was had upon the chamber's policy as to Muscle Shoals and of public ownership of power plants generally.

THE 1930 REFERENDUM

For 10 years an active propaganda against public ownership was conducted by officials of the chamber who were at the same time the officials in charge of the propaganda of the power interests. The records fail to disclose a single instance during this period in which a publication of the chamber set forth the facts concerning the more than 2,000 municipally owned power plants in the United States.

The ground thus thoroughly prepared, the national officials in November 1930 submitted to referendum of the local organizations the recommendations of a special committee on "National water power policies", which they had appointed the previous year. The recommendations, of course, were hostile to public ownership, declaring that "the development and distribution of electric power is within the proper sphere of private enterprise", etc.—15 recommendations in all. The results were foreordained, especially considering the fact, as is well known, that the returns were made in many, if not most, cases by the local boards of directors, controlled by local utility executives and lawyers, and not submitted to the local rank and file at all. The power companies' views prevailed overwhelmingly, but even under these adverse circumstances, a respectable minority voted against the recommendations. For example, there were 2,680 votes in favor of the committee's recommendations "that the Muscle Shoals project should be sold or leased, as is, on the best possible terms", and 158 against it. This was the official chamber's decision quoted in President Harriman's letter of April 13, 1933, noted above.

It will now be instructive to inquire into the connections and tactics of the great utility executives who as officials of the chamber of commerce have committed American business men at large to their selfish point of view by frightening them into the belief that if a community establishes a public power plant it will probably next go into the shoe business, etc., making no distinction between private competitive business and monopolistic public utilities.

LEWIS E. PIERSON

Power: Director Electric Bond & Share Co., and National Power & Light; member National Electric Light Association. Chairman of the Irving Trust Co., New York.

Chamber: Director 1917-20; director of finance 1920-24; vice president 1924-27; president 1927-28. Member senior council 1928 to date, still serving. During this period Mr. Pierson has also been on the following committees: Public utilities, governing board of Nation's business, publicity, etc.

All together, Mr. Pierson has probably been the most influential factor during his long service of introducing and continuing the policies of the Power Trust as policies of the chamber. The Electric Bond & Share Co., through its control of several southern power companies to be directly affected by public operation of Muscle Shoals, was until recently captained by Sidney Z. Mitchell, a dominating influence in Pierson's bank, and, with Samuel Insull, in the National Electric Light Association. In 1920, Pierson became chairman of the public-utilities committee and also active in propaganda, and was a dominating influence in the Nation's Business, organ of the chamber. The Federal Trade Commission's exhibits carry some illuminating instances of his militant attitude. In 1923, he addressed the National Electric Light Association convention on the subject, Public Utilities and the Public Interest. He argued that public ownership was not in the public interest, that the public must be convinced of this and that "in the creation of this public attitude the public utilities themselves must take the lead—they know better than anyone else the failure of Government ownership." (Trade Commission's Exhibit 732.) In 1927, when president of the chamber of commerce, he addressed a meeting of the national counselors of the chamber at West Baden, Ind., on the subject, The Responsibility of the Business Man to His Government. The business man, he said in effect, was "any citizen from a farmer up", and business men must prevent the destruction of the American Government by preventing the entry of the Government into any business. Power was, of course, emphasized. Hence, "To discharge its responsibility to the Government and the Nation, American business must become militant. It must create a public opinion which can make itself felt when need arises * * * all efforts of our national chamber are destined to be futile unless its member bodies stand ready to uphold its hands when it takes a position upon questions of national concern." (Trade Commission's exhibit 842.) Thousands of copies of this chamber of commerce speech were circulated in pamphlet form by the joint committee of national utility associations in 1927 in its fight against the Walsh resolution to investigate the Power Trust, the Boulder Dam, and the Muscle Shoals bills, then pending in Congress.

POWER POLITICS IN THE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE

A large number of the exhibits of the Federal Trade Commission disclose very active Nation-wide campaigns carried on by the electric, gas, and electric-railway national associations for the elections of Philip H. Gadsden, vice president and director of the United Gas Improvement Co. of Philadelphia, and Matthew S. Sloan, president of the New York Edison Co., to be directors of the United States Chamber of Commerce.

For example, exhibit no. 4126 is a letter dated April 21, 1927, from Paul S. Clapp, managing director of the National Electric Light Association, to John W. Lieb, general manager of the New York Edison Co., "for your guidance in voting at the forthcoming annual meeting of the United States Chamber of Commerce." Attached is a list of "candidates to be supported by the National Electric Light Association." Sloan and Gadsden were, of course, among them.

Incidentally, Mr. Clapp, prior to this position, which he took in 1926, was power secretary to Hon. Herbert Hoover, Secretary of Commerce. Exhibits 430, 429, 806, 875, 3315, and 3325 will illustrate the Nation-wide activities of the utility men, working inside and outside chambers of commerce for the election of these two particular men. Their importance will now be shown.

PHILIP H. GADSDEN, OF PHILADELPHIA

Utilities: Vice president United Gas Improvement Co., Philadelphia, 1919-33; vice president Charleston (S.C.) Light & Power Co., 1907-17; director Fidelity Mutual Life Insurance Co.; president Southern Gas Association, 1922; president American Electric Railway Association, 1921; vice president (and driving factor) Joint Committee of National Utility Associations, 1927-32; member National Electric Light Association; member American Bar Association.

Chamber: Director, 1921-29; chairman or member important utilities committee, including chairmanship on the governing board of Nation's Business, especially in 1927; director Pennsylvania State Chamber of Commerce; president Philadelphia Chamber of Commerce, 1927 to date.

As already shown, the utilities in 1927 conducted a Nation-wide campaign to reelect Mr. Gadsden Director of the United States Chamber of Commerce. The date is significant, since in that year, as already shown, the power, gas, and street-railroad men formed the joint committee to defeat the Walsh resolution for an investigation of the Power Trust and public operation of Boulder Dam and Muscle Shoals. Gadsden was made vice president and the directing force in this effort. He was to be much in Washington. The utilities needed the chamber's help, and Gadsden was very active in both camps for 2 or 3 years.

Gadsden is not only a public-utility executive but a master lawyer-politician. Back in Charleston, S.C., from whence he came, the law firm of Mordecai & Gadsden dominated the machine which once ran the city and the State of South Carolina as well.

Gadsden's joint committee got results, as shown. Lewis E. Pierson, of the Electric Bond & Share, elected to the national chamber in 1927, promptly delivered an address before the national counselors of the chamber on October 18, 1927, entitled "The Responsibility of the Business Man to His Government" (see Pierson), which was soon "reprinted by permission" and circulated by the joint committee.

One of the editorials of Merle Thorpe, editor of the Nation's Business, Bureaucracy in Fine Flower, which was also reprinted in leaflet form by the joint committee, said: "American business must find an answer, and it is not Government ownership." But Gadsden's exploits were too numerous to be even listed here.

One of Mr. Gadsden's exploits as president of the Philadelphia Chamber of Commerce was to personally call upon Mr. Samuel Insull, in Chicago, and induce him to speak at the ninth annual centenary luncheon of the Philadelphia chamber in the ballroom of the Bellevue-Stratford Hotel on December 10, 1930. The event was announced with great eclat. It was one of Mr. Insull's last public appearances.

MATTHEW S. SLOAN

Power: President the New York Edison Co.; president United Electric Light & Power Co.; president Brooklyn Edison Co., Inc., etc.; director Irving Trust Co., New York; president National Electric Light Association; member executive committee of the Joint Committee of National Utility Associations.

Chamber: Director national resource productions department, 1927 to date; member executive committee United States Chamber of Commerce; member Colorado River committee of chamber; member governing board Nation's Business.

The above are but a few of the numerous official and other connections of Mr. Sloan, which occupies over two pages of the chamber's Who's Who on the Board for 1930-31.

He was one of the most powerful figures from his election as director in 1927 to 1932. He made numerous addresses, which had great weight with the business men of the Nation. In 1925 Mr. Sloan was the chairman of the public relations national section of the National Electric Light Association. He was greatly interested in getting National Electric Light Association propaganda into the universities and even the public schools. The discovery of this attempt by the National Electric Light Association to capture the Nation's educational system was a surprising result of the Trade Commission's investigation and aroused great indignation. Exhibit No. 4167 of the investigation gives proof of this intent. From it we learn that in 1925 in his report to the convention Chairman Sloan said:

"It is perhaps impossible to make our public-relations work so inclusive that it will stretch from the cradle to the grave, but we can at least begin early with it, and there is a particular need for furnishing correct information about our industry in the schools."

How near the cradle was indicated by Chairman Sloan at the 1926 convention. He reported:

"The section has prepared a 32-page book, printed in color, for children. It is titled 'The Ohm Queen', and is intended to tell the story of electrical service in the home, particularly to the young people, who are such an important element in our homes and who will be the customers, the investors, the voters, and the lawmakers of the future."

JULIUS H. BARNES

Power: No direct connections.

Chamber: President, 1922-24; member senior council, 1924-31; chairman of the board, 1929-32; member of executive committee. Served on numerous committees.

Had Mr. Barnes been as high a power executive as Mr. Sloan, he could not have been a more vigorous fighter against public ownership and operation of electrical utilities than he has been for the past 10 years over the radio, in public speeches, and in his official utterances as an officer of the chamber of commerce. Manifestly his data has been furnished chiefly by the power people and is many times misleading. He even went so far as to make a slashing attack on public ownership before a convention of the International Chamber of Commerce, held in Europe, when attending as a delegate from the United States Chamber of Commerce, this before the United States Chamber of Commerce had announced an official position upon public ownership, yet he presumed to speak officially for American business men as being against public ownership.

SILAS H. STRAWN

Utilities: Senior member of the firm of Winston, Strawn & Shaw, Chicago railroad and utilities lawyers; general solicitor of the Alton Railroad; solicitor Michigan Central Railroad; attorney Chicago Great Western Railroad, New York Central, etc.

Chamber: Honorary vice president, 1928-29; president, 1931-32; member senior council, 1932 to date; chairman executive committee and American committee of the International Chamber of Commerce; member of executive and other committees.

Mr. Strawn is, of course, in sympathy with the general pro-utility policy of the chamber. To vary the presentation we may here give a picture of Mr. Strawn's activities in Chicago, where he ranks as a superadviser for big business. He seldom appears in court and pays little attention to actual legal practice. He has for a number of years been a director of the First National Bank of Chicago and one of the most influential men on the board. While a Republican, he never allows politics to interfere with his own or his clients' business affairs. He helps both Republicans and Democrats to make up their party tickets and collects campaign contributions for both parties in local campaigns.

Mr. Strawn has been a close friend of Samuel Insull for many years, and in 1930 in a bitter fight over a perpetual franchise designed to give Insull control of all the traction facilities of Chicago and the surrounding metropolitan area, Strawn took an active part in fighting on the Insull side. He gave out interviews favoring the ordinance, and with other leading business men signed misleading full-page advertisements to influence a favorable verdict for Insull in the referendum election. He is a member of a number of large corporations.

HARRY C. ABELL, OF NEW ORLEANS, LA.

Power: President National Power & Light Co.; vice president Electric Bond & Share Co.; vice president Electric Power Light Corporation; vice president New Orleans Public Service, Inc.; chairman of the board Memphis Power & Light Co. and Western Tennessee Power & Light Co.; director, Arkansas Power & Light Co., Louisiana Power & Light Co., Mississippi Power & Light Co., Carolina Power & Light Co., and the Knoxville Power & Light Co.

Chamber: Director, national resource productions department, 1930 to date; member, Field Department Committee.

Exhibit No. 3360 and other exhibits and testimony of the Trade Commission investigation show that Mr. Abell represented the Electric Bond & Share Co. on a committee, along with Bernard Mullaney, of the Insull interests, the purpose of which was to standardize the "school pamphlets" being issued by the various propaganda bureaus of the power interests over the Nation. Abell was the director of the National Electric Light Association. It is shown that around 500,000 copies were printed in 1927, and it was hoped 1,000,000 would be printed in 1928.

Other information as to Mr. Abell's activities might be mentioned, but perhaps this is enough.

MERLE THORPE

No summary of the activities of the chamber of commerce men in behalf of the private utilities can omit the name of Mr. Merle Thorpe, versatile and able $50,000 a year editor of the chamber's official organ, the Nation's Business, since 1919. He has fought their battles in his magazine and in his weekly radio talks, heard by millions over the National Broadcasting Co.'s network, which service is rendered free by the company, which is closely affiliated with the power interests.

On December 29, 1930, in Mr. Thorpe's broadcast on Power and Politics, he bemoaned the interference of our wicked politicians with the beneficent services of the power companies. He repeated the threadbare misrepresentations of Ontario Hydro and gave the inevitable warning to "taxpayers." In 1932-33 he broadcast a series on Our Vanishing Freedom, which warned against governmental interference with "individual initiative" of our corporation leaders. His viewpoint is thus disclosed.

In 1921, at the beginning of the present propounder regime, Mr. Thorpe printed an article in the Nation's Business, Fair Play for Public Utilities, by George B. Cortelyou, then president of the American Gas Association, later window-dressing president of the joint committee of national utility associations. The article was hostile to real regulation, which was called paternalistic and which means "increased cost to the consumer."

In the 1923 June issue is an article, The Customer Owner, by Edward N. Hurley of Shipping Board fame who, among other things, is director of several power and railroad companies and now a director of the chamber. The article was hostile to public ownership, Customer Ownership Is the Foil to the Unscrupulous Political Agitator. A good thing for the people.

In the December 1923 issue we have an article on The Blight of Government in Business, by George E. Roberts, vice president of the National City Bank, New York, who naturally showed up public ownership and control to be a dismal failure. In the next issue Mr. Roberts writes on The Illusion of Federal Commissions, aimed at the Federal Power and Trade Commissions, over which Thorpe grew enthusiastic in an introductory note.

The February issue of 1925 had for Mr. Thorpe a journalistic triumph in the publication of an article, Facts the Senate Never Got, by Samuel S. Wyer, described by the editor as a "distinguished engineer who has just completed a study of Niagara for the Smithsonian Institution." * * * It is a plain statement of facts." The article was aimed directly at the Muscle Shoals bill then pending in Congress, and was specified as a refutation of Senator Norris' claims that the publicly owned and operated system of Ontario was a success.

Thorpe editorially summarized Wyer's conclusions that Ontario Hydro—

First. Is selling more cheaply only to the domestic consumers, who get current below cost.

Second. It is charging more to the industrial users than the cost in the United States.

Third. It is directly subsidized by the Province treasury.

Fourth. It is providing no proper sinking fund.

Finally, "In other words, Ontario is robbing the industrial Peter to pay the domestic Paul. Moreover, it is putting off the inevitable day when the bill for construction and upkeep must be kept."

Every one of these assertions was demonstrated to be absolute misstatements of fact. Now note the connection.

On January 15 the Smithsonian Institution had published a pamphlet by Wyer, Niagara Falls, its Power Possibilities and Preservation, the main purpose of which was an attack on Ontario Hydro timed for the Norris bill fight in Congress. The Federal Trade Commission investigation later proved to an astonished country a sinister connection of the National Electric Light Association with this episode. (See exhibit no. 1182 and Wyer's testimony before the Commission.)

In April 1927 we have an article, The Investment Banker on Guard, by Pliny Jewell, president of the Investment Bankers Association. It carried a cartoon by Fitzpatrick showing Mr. Common People, pocketbook in his hand, blinders over his eyes, walking toward a dark street corner behind which lurk huge hold-up men labeled "Gold Brick", "Blue Sky", and "Get-Rich-Quick." Behind the citizen stands a big policeman with his eye on the crooks whose name is "Investment Bankers Association." This article appeared before the disclosures of the Insull, National City Bank, and similar exploitations aided by this association.

In January 1926, there is a laudatory article, Niagara in Politics, being the review of a book by Professor Mavor of Toronto. The Federal Trade Commission investigation later showed Professor Mavor received money from the National Electric Light Association, which sent 5,000 copies of the book gratis to libraries.

The June issue of 1931 has an article, "Turning Kilowatts into Votes, by Matthew S. Sloan, president of the New York Edison Co. The April issue of 1933 has an article, Muscle Shoals—Operate It or Scrap It, by David J. Guy, a hydroelectrical engineer of the chamber staff. Its viewpoint and data are similar to the arguments and figures being put out by Power Trust spokesmen and seek to show that the Government is entering upon a dangerous and costly experiment in the Roosevelt-Norris plan.

These are but a few of the numerous articles and editorials which show that Editor Thorpe in his conduct of the Nation's Business has played the game of the Power Trust every step of the way since 1919. He is one of the cleverest and most misleading propagandists for special privilege in the United States today. But let us be just to Mr. Thorpe. He has been merely carrying out the desires of the great utility executives on the governing board of the Nation's Business, and in control of the utility policy of the United States Chamber of Commerce.

PROF. E. A. ROSS ON CHAMBERS OF COMMERCE

A remarkable estimate of the true import and influence of the United States Chamber of Commerce and its local chambers in our national life was given by that noted, practical scholar, Prof. E. A. Ross, of Wisconsin University, dean of American sociology, in an address before a conference of progressives held in Washington, D.C., March 11-12, 1931.

Dealing with the influence of chambers of commerce and advertisers over the editorial policy of our newspapers, he said:

"Now that sort of a club is more and more being held over the newspapermen. We now have 1,673 chambers of commerce in this country affiliated with, of course, and under the United States Chamber of Commerce, and these chambers of commerce have a committee on publicity. * * * And that club everywhere is being held over newspapermen in a larger proportion of American towns. * * *

"Another important thing is the tremendous development in recent years in the organization of business men. At the present time only 13 percent of labor in this country is in any way organized. About 12 percent of the farmers are in any way organized. But do you know that from 50 percent to 60 percent of the business men are organized? And not only that but the interesting thing is that the organizations of business men, which include 920,000 business men in 1,673 chambers of commerce, are controlled by the one type. The great bulk of merchandisers, the merchants, are not capitalists essentially. Their income comes in the form of compensation for their activities, their personal efforts. I don't call a man a capitalist until 50 percent or more of his income comes to him by virtue of his owning property. But the upper 20 percent of the organized business men are capitalists, and they are controlling the minds of the great rank and file of ordinary merchants and causing their chests to swell out with their ego—I am a business man. You can just watch them in recent years get the big head owing to cunning propaganda from up above.

"Now if there is any class in all American history that has formulated its wishes in a more selfish, narrow, and shameless way than the United States Chamber of Commerce, then I should like to have that class shown me. [Applause.] You understand, of course, that they have many hundreds of local organizations; their referendum is invited by the cunning schemers at the top of the United States Chamber of Commerce; and in many cases the local secretary just sends in what the vote is, or in other cases submits to the body of the directors, and in general it does not go to the rank and file and so the people who call for these referenda are people pretty well able to get the kind of answers they want, and I invite you to read the 800 or more referenda if you want an exhibition of the most shameless, most narrow-minded class interest that we have record of. You can read the demands of the American Federation of Labor without blushing. Many of them are demands that we all agree to. They are perfectly reasonable. You can read the demands of organized farmers without blushing. I defy you, if you are not a business man, to read the demands of the United States Chamber of Commerce without blushing."

MR. W. L. CRADDOCK'S REPORT FROM MISSOURI

A report from Mr. W. L. Craddock, a merchant of the prosperous little city of Mexico, Mo., on what is happening in that State is presented here, since it is typical of every State. Mr. Craddock is not a radical. He is an enterprising business man, interested in his own success and ambitious for the success of his town. His interest in the utility problem was stimulated when he began to compare the rates charged by the municipally owned electric and water plants of the neighboring city of Marshall, Mo., with those charged by the unit of the Missouri Light & Power Co. operating in his town.

The following table published by Mr. Craddock in 1931 is in point:

Marshall, Mo.—Population, 8,100

The Marshall electric plant and water plant is owned and operated by the city for the benefit of their own people. The money stays and circulates in Marshall.

Mexico, Mo.—Population, 8,200

The Mexico electric plant, water plant, gas plant, and ice plant is owned and operated by a private eastern corporation, the Missouri Power & Light Co., for the benefit and private profit of this company, including a network of other holding companies, and finally to the benefit of parent holding company, the North American Co., in New York City.

Mexico, Mo., has—

378 street lights (average 3 watts per person living in Mexico), cost per year	$7,377.60
114 fire hydrants, cost per year	5,490.00
1 drinking fountain, cost per month (June 1931), 12,300 gallons	42.00
Cost per year for service tendered to schools by Missouri Power & Light Co.	2,267.82
Heat, light, and water for public library, 1 year	386.43

Amounts paid to Missouri Power & Light Co. by Audrain County for year ending June 30, 1931:

Audrain Hospital, for light, water, gas, ice	1,872.50
Amount of water used in county jail for—
April 1931, 16,600 cubic feet of water	$56.12
May 1931, 23,300 cubic feet of water	77.56
June 1931, 22,500 cubic feet of water	75.00
Audrain Jail, for light, water, gas	1,317.11
Audrain Courthouse, for light, heat, water	1,729.21
Total	4,918.82

This makes a total paid out by our citizens from taxes annually to the Missouri Power & Light Co. of Mexico of $28,482.67.

Marshall, Mo., has 1,271 street lights (average, 12 watts per person living in Marshall), no cost to city; 248 fire hydrants, no cost to city; 2 drinking fountains, no cost to city.

Actual amount of water used in two fountains would have cost in Marshall for 1 year, $9.52.

Twenty-two thousand five hundred cubic feet of water is approximately 168,400 gallons. This amount would fill an average large storeroom. One hundred and sixty-eight thousand four hundred gallons per month amounts to over 112 barrels per day (50 gallons to barrel).

Twenty-two thousand five hundred cubic feet of water in Marshall would have cost $47.33, which is 37 percent less than Mexico's rate.

The city of Marshall furnishes in lights to her citizens free, $30,807.64, as well as free water service for fire hydrants, drinking fountains, sewer flushing, etc., to the amount of $12,713.38.

This makes a total of free service and relieves taxpayers in Marshall annually of $43,521.02.

On investigation, Mr. Craddock found that the Marshall plants were financially sound, that all operating, sinking fund, and interest charges were met out of rates, and nothing came from general taxation.

The M. P. & L. Co.'s gas franchise in Mexico expired and the city refused to renew without a sharp reduction from the $1.60 per thousand then in force.

Mr. Craddock and some other business men and members of the city council started a movement for public ownership of gas and electricity in their city. To their surprise, they met the determined opposition of the Mexico Chamber of Commerce, whose dominating head was Mr. Paul Eckern, district manager of the Missouri Power & Light Co., supported by the local bankers, etc., with the net result that the power company is still in command of the utility situation in the town.

In the course of the struggle, Mr. Craddock discovered that chambers of commerce in other Missouri towns and in other States were likewise supporting the position of the private utilities and that the literature hostile to public ownership and operation being sent out by the United States Chamber of Commerce in Washington was being used to oppose proper regulation or public ownership in these towns, this not only by business men but by officials of the power companies themselves.

For example, at a mass meeting incident to a struggle over a gas franchise in Booneville in 1931, presided over by T. W. Long, manager of the Booneville district of the Missouri Power & Light Co., Maj. A. B. Bates, of the Kemper Military School, cited examples of the failure of municipal ownership from the national chamber's literature. The material was of the kind being circulated by the National Electric Light Association.

The University City Chamber of Commerce in 1932 opposed in an election a bond issue of $500,000 for a municipally owned street-lighting system.

The situation in St. Louis was expressed by a letter published in the St. Louis Post Dispatch by W. Keane Small:

"* * * It has long been a source of wonder to me that the St. Louis Chamber of Commerce, as now organized, can attract the membership of any man who holds to the principle that the best interests of a community are served by measures primarily of benefit to all the people rather than those of benefit to a certain group or of some special interest. * * * Why did it fall to oppose the scandalous transaction by which the Laclede Gas Light Co. was acquired by a group of out-of-town promoters, the stock manipulated, the rate-making valuation inflated, and an additional burden put upon every home in the city? * * * Why is it not now (1931) represented in the contest between the city and the Union Electric Light & Power Co. involving the question of rates? etc."

These are typical of the actions of chambers of commerce all over Missouri and other States.

It is small wonder that Mr. Craddock has come to the belief that the rank and file of competitive business men should awaken to the fact that the United States Chamber of Commerce does not represent them; that its support of the monopolistic power and other utility companies is untenable and inimical to the best interests of the ultimate consumers and of municipalities overburdened with debt, struggling to free themselves by proper utilization of their own municipal utilities.

ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF INTERIOR—NOTIFICATION TO PRESIDENT

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, yesterday in executive session the Senate confirmed the nomination of Oscar L. Chapman, of Colorado, to be Assistant Secretary of the Interior. As in executive session, I now ask unanimous consent that the President be notified of such confirmation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the President will be notified.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

RELIEF OF INSURANCE COMPANIES

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 1094.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed that the bill was considered on a previous occasion and the first committee amendment was agreed to. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Florida.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed consideration of the bill (S. 1094) to provide for the purchase by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation of preferred stock and/or bonds and/or debentures of insurance companies.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will state the next amendment reported by the committee.

The CHIEF CLERK. The next amendment of the Committee on Banking and Currency is, on page 2, line 17, to strike out "an amount sufficient" and insert "$100,000,000 in order to provide funds"; and in line 19, to strike out the word "section" and insert the word "act", so as to read:

The amount of notes, bonds, debentures, and other such obligations, which the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized and empowered to issue and to have outstanding at any one time under existing law is hereby increased by $100,000,000 in order to provide funds to carry out the provisions of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, after line 5, to insert a new section, as follows:

SEC. 3. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation shall not subscribe for, purchase, or accept as collateral for a loan under this act, any preferred stock, notes, bonds, or debentures of any applicant insurance company (1) until the applicant shows to the satisfaction of the Corporation that it can furnish an amount of new capital equal to that for which application is made to the Corporation, (2) if at the time of such subscription, purchase, or acceptance any officer, director, or employee of the applicant is receiving compensation at a rate in excess of $17,500 per annum, and (3) unless at such time the applicant agrees to the satisfaction of the Corporation not to increase the compensation of any of its officers, directors, or employees, and not to retire any of its stock, notes, bonds, or debentures issued for capital purposes, while any part of the preferred stock, notes, bonds, or debentures of such company is held by the Corporation. For the purposes of this section, the term "compensation" includes any salary, fee, bonus, commission, or other payment, direct or indirect, in money or otherwise, for personal services.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I desire to submit a suggestion to the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] to ascertain whether or not it will meet his approval. I am in thorough sympathy with the object of the measure. As a matter of fact when the Reconstruction Finance Corporation bill was passed originally, I offered an amendment which would have provided a limitation on salaries in connection with all business enterprises borrowing money from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. So far as the amendment goes it is excellent.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. I have an amendment which covers the very point the Senator is discussing.

Mr. BLACK. I do not know what the amendment is.

Mr. WALSH. It is an amendment providing that the same salary limit named in the committee amendment shall be applied to all corporations that borrow money from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

Mr. BLACK. I am very much interested in that proposal. I was wondering if the committee amendment with reference to $17,500 salaries was considered by the committee as being an adequate limitation.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, to whom is the Senator directing his inquiry?

Mr. BLACK. I was directing it to the chairman of the committee, the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER]. I want to say that I have pending before the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads a bill which was introduced at the very beginning of this session of Congress. A hearing was held on the bill. The purpose of the bill was to prevent the lending of any more money or the renewing of any more loans to business enterprises which pay salaries in excess of a certain amount. The bill also went further and provided a limitation of salaries for those shipping interests and air mail companies which receive subsidies from the Government. Unfortunately the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads have made no report on the bill.

I have not seen the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alabama yield to enable me to offer my amendment?

Mr. BLACK. I shall be glad to hear it read. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. WALSH. I offer the following amendment to the committee amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. The Senator from Massachusetts proposes, on page 3, after line 25, to insert the following new section:

SEC. 4. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation shall not make any loans under the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, as amended, or under the Emergency Relief and Construction Act of 1932, (1) if at the time of such loan any officer, director, or employee of the applicant is receiving compensation at a rate in excess of $17,500, and (2) unless at such time the applicant agrees to the satisfaction of the Corporation not to increase the compensation of any of its officers, directors, or employees while such loan is outstanding. For the purposes of this section the term "compensation" includes any salary, fee, bonus, commission, or other payment, direct or indirect, in money or otherwise for personal services.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I desire to say, with reference to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, that it needs an addition in order to make it effective. The amendment provides that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation "shall not make any loans", and so forth. In order for the amendment to reach the purpose intended it should provide that it "shall not make or extend any loans", and so forth.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] called my attention to the fact that the amendment may not include renewals or extended loans, so I have no objection to modifying it to include the words suggested by the Senator. The modification might well be incorporated in line 2 of my amendment, after the word "make", by inserting the words "or renew or extend", so it would read: "The Construction Finance Corporation shall not make or renew or extend any loans", and so forth. I modify the amendment accordingly.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator has the right to modify his amendment.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, I think the amendment needs further modification so that during the existence of any loan no increase in salaries beyond this amount shall be permitted.

Mr. WALSH. I do not seek to make it retroactive.

Mr. COUZENS. Nor do I; but a corporation might today get a loan and 3 months from now might raise the salaries of its executive officers. I do not think the amendment is broad enough to prevent such action. I think it ought to apply not only at the inception of any such loan, but during the existence of any existing loans and any new loans. There are three phases involved.

Mr. BLACK. That can be very easily taken care of by adopting the language of the bill which I have introduced, and I am sure the Senator will be glad to modify his amendment so it would read "while such loan is outstanding and unpaid." In other words, there shall be a limitation while the loan is outstanding and unpaid.

Mr. President, I desire to speak briefly on the amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BLACK. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I understand the Senator's amendment to provide that salaries paid from all sources shall not be more than $17,500 to any executive officer?

Mr. BLACK. I rose to offer an amendment of my own, but yielded to the Senator from Massachusetts, who desired to offer an amendment. I have not had an opportunity of carefully studying his amendment.

I will say that my amendment proposes a limitation of $12,500, which in my personal judgment is enough for any official or employee of a company that has to come to the United States Government to obtain money to operate its business. I raised that question when the original Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act was under consideration in the Senate. My recollection is that my amendment received 18 votes in the Senate. I then offered a limitation of $12,500. I then offered a limitation of $25,000. I then offered a limitation of $50,000. I then offered a limitation of $100,000. The Senate voted each proposal down. Since that time millions and millions of dollars have been loaned by the Government through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

I have in my desk a record showing that companies which have been borrowing money from the United States Government have been paying salaries of more than $100,000 a year out of Government money. One railroad which, according to the figures I have been able to obtain, had borrowed $31,000,000, pays three salaries of more than $100,000 each per year. It pays many salaries of $75,000 or $80,000. Insofar as my personal preference is concerned, it is my belief that the Senator from Massachusetts could well propose a limitation of $12,500. Why should those who use Government money for the purpose of carrying on their business be better paid than the members of the President's Cabinet, when the money to operate their business comes from the same taxpayers who contribute to the payment of the salaries of Cabinet officers of the United States? We have been providing money by the hundreds of millions, and it has been going out for the purpose of paying these huge salaries. This could have been prevented heretofore if the amendment which I offered had been adopted. I am very glad indeed that the Senator from Massachusetts has offered his amendment.

Mr. FLETCHER and Mr. DILL addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, the Senator asked a question of me a moment ago, which I should like to answer.

Mr. BLACK. Very well; I will yield first to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. This is the first measure where the question has been presented concretely. The Senate has the opportunity of limiting salaries. First, there was a proposition in the committee to limit them to $25,000. Then someone suggested $10,000. Finally the committee agreed on $17,500. That is the outside figure—"not in excess of $17,500." After discussing the matter the committee reached the conclusion that that was the fairest and most just amount to name. It is purely arbitrary. We have not any basis for it except general information on the subject. We thought there ought to be a limitation. We do not think it ought to be too high, and we do not think it ought to be so low as to be unreasonable or unjust. We finally agreed on $17,500. I think that is about the best figure we can name, "not in excess of $17,500."

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I desire to state with reference to such salaries that if private money were being used to operate private business and private money desired to pay $17,500 or $50,000, that would be the business of the stockholders. We have, however, adopted an economy program here which has left thousands of veterans without the compensation they have been receiving. It has reduced others. It has greatly reduced the compensation of officers who were wounded in the World War. We have reduced the salary of every Government employee, even those who are receiving less than $1,000. We have not set up $17,500 as a standard for Government employees; and I take the position that the very minute a private business enterprise comes to the Federal Government and holds out its hand and asks for money from the taxpayers to operate its business, it should be controlled by the same salary and wage base as the United States Government.

For instance, I do not believe it is fair or proper to tell private business enterprises that they can pay their cabinet officers or their directors or their officials $17,500 out of the money of the taxpayers while the taxpayers' directors can draw only $12,500 per year. If the Senator from Massachusetts does not amend his proposal so as to place a limitation of $12,500, I shall offer to amend it myself.

I desire to ask the Senator from Massachusetts if he does not think that with the salaries which the Government has established as standard, $12,500 is a sufficient salary for those who are paid out of Government money.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, these salaries are not paid out of Government money. It is my opinion that we have gone pretty far in the original amendment proposed by the committee, making the limit $17,500. Personally, I would not have gone quite so far in offering a general amendment. I hope the Senator will not press his suggestion. It seems to me the words "not in excess of $17,500" are sufficiently drastic for the purposes we have in mind. Of course, none of this money that is borrowed from the Government is necessarily applied for salaries.

Mr. BLACK. Of course it may not be.

Mr. WALSH. The money is borrowed upon securities of the company. It would help to improve the security, of course, to keep the salary list down to the minimum.

Mr. BLACK. They may not take the money which the Government turns over to them and deliver it directly to those who are drawing salaries; but it is evident that without the Government money the business could not operate. That is the general theory on which they use Government money; and it seems to me we would come nearer meeting the situation if we would recognize that they are worth no more, for instance, than a Cabinet officer of the United States.

Mr. WALSH. The committee have given the matter a good deal of attention, and they inform me that they reached the agreement that $17,500 was a reasonable limitation; and I am inclined to agree with the committee on that subject.

Mr. BLACK. I wish to state to the Senator that I am very glad indeed that he and others have reached the conclusion that this is a proper limitation.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] also informs me that this limitation was fixed after consultation with some members of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

Mr. BLACK. Before I take my seat I should like to state that there is pending before the Post Office Committee, and has been pending there for several months, and a hearing was held upon it, a measure providing a like limitation for shipping and air mail companies, many of which have been paying exorbitant salaries out of Government subsidies; and it seems to me this would be a very appropriate time for the Post Office Committee to make a report on that measure.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Florida to the language in line 18, page 3. I can scarcely believe it was the intention of the Banking and Currency Committee to prohibit these companies from raising the pay of an office boy or a scrub woman or minor employees of that sort, and yet that is the effect of the committee amendment as it reads. I should like to suggest to the Senator that his amendment will be better if he will strike out the words "or employees" and have it read "officers or directors."

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I am inclined to think that criticism is just. I quite agree that where these corporations now have employees receiving, say, $1,200 a year, during the course of their operations those men might prove very efficient and worth more than that, and I see no reason why they should not be advanced.

Mr. REED. And if we are going to inflate the currency and raise the cost of living we certainly ought not to prohibit minor employees from receiving adjustments of their pay.

Mr. WALSH. I think the Senator's suggestion is a very appropriate one.

Mr. REED. The same suggestion applies to the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. My amendment was copied after the committee amendment.

Mr. REED. Then I suggest that in both amendments the language "officers, directors, or employees" be changed to read "officers or directors."

Mr. DILL. Mr. President—

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. DILL. I desire to call the Senator's attention to the fact that there are some employees who are receiving large salaries. Would it not be well to say, "employees receiving in excess of $10,000 per annum", or some limitation like that? It seems to me there ought to be a limitation on them that ought not to apply to the low-paid employees.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. COUZENS. I think the Senator from Washington is right, because we have so many of these commission men and annuity men that there ought to be some limitation on the compensation of employees. Then, there always is the question of whether an officer can be changed to an employee and exempted under a provision of that kind.

Mr. REED. All right. Then I propose, Mr. President, and I move as an amendment, on line 18 of page 3, after the word "employees", to insert "to an amount in excess of $17,500."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the Chair state to the Senator from Pennsylvania that there are two amendments now pending. One is the committee amendment, and the other is an amendment to the committee amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH]. The regular parliamentary procedure would be to dispose of those amendments first.

Mr. WALSH. I will include in my amendment the Senator's suggestion; and I now ask that my amendment, as modified, be stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, as modified, will be stated.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The Reconstruction Finance Corporation shall not make, renew, or extend any loan under the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, as amended, or under the Emergency Relief and Construction Act of 1932 (1) if at the time of making, renewing, or extending such loan any officer, director, or employee of the applicant is receiving compensation at a rate of $17,500 per annum, and (2) unless at such time the applicant agrees to the satisfaction of the Corporation not to increase the compensation of any of its officers, directors, or employees to any amount in excess of $17,500 while such loan is outstanding and unpaid. For the purposes of this section the term "compensation" includes any salary, fee, bonus, commission, or other payment, direct or indirect, in money or otherwise for personal services.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, as modified, to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. WALSH. I think the amendment in its present form covers the suggestions made by the Senator from Michigan and the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. DILL. The language read by the clerk, as I understood it, did not have the words "in excess of $17,500."

Mr. NORRIS. I was going to call attention to that myself. I have not read it; but, as the clerk read it, that limitation was not included.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will again state that portion of the modified amendment.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The Reconstruction Finance Corporation shall not make, renew, or extend any loan under the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, as amended, or under the Emergency Relief and Construction Act of 1932, (1) if at the time of making, renewing, or extending such loan any officer, director, or employee of the applicant is receiving compensation at a rate in excess of $17,500 per annum—

Mr. NORRIS. That is the place.

Mr. WALSH. The drafting clerk informs me that it is not necessary there. It is necessary in the latter place.

Mr. NORRIS. It ought to be "not in excess", it seems to me.

Mr. REED. The clerk read it that way.

Mr. NORRIS. No; the way the clerk read it, they shall not make the loan if any officer is getting a salary of $17,500.

Mr. DILL. That is the way he read it first.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Is receiving compensation at a rate in excess of $17,500 per annum, and (2) unless at such time the applicant agrees to the satisfaction of the Corporation not to increase the compensation of any of its officers, directors, or employees to any amount in excess of $17,500 while such loan is outstanding and unpaid. For the purposes of this section the term "compensation"—

And so forth.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana and Mr. DILL addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Pennsylvania has the floor. Does he yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. REED. Just for a moment I desire to call attention to another point in this amendment and in the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Many of these insurance companies—most of them, in fact—pay their solicitors commissions in accordance with the amount of business they do. They give them a certain percentage of the first and the renewal premiums. The effect of this provision would be to apply to the most successful of those agents. A company which had industrious and effective agents, and had contracts with them, would be unable to apply under this bill. I am sure it is not the intention of the Senate to strike down those contracts.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, that would not apply to my amendment. It would apply to the committee amendment, which deals with insurance companies.

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. My amendment deals with other than insurance companies. It would not apply to my amendment.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, the large life-insurance companies have different agents all over the country. Does the Senator think they would be regarded as employees or officers?

Mr. REED. Oh, undoubtedly they are employees, and they are paid on a commission basis; and the definition which is proposed at the end of the section shows that they are included:

The term "compensation" includes any salary, fee, bonus, commission, or other payment, direct or indirect, in money or otherwise for personal services.

As I understand the action of the committee, it is aimed at the excessive salaries that are being taken by the presidents of the large insurance companies; and with that all of us must feel some sympathy. We certainly are not aiming at the hard-working agent. He is paid on a piecework basis. The harder he works the more he is paid; and nobody has complained about what is earned by these agents. The complaint has never gone to that.

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON] the other day put in the RECORD a list of the salaries paid to the presidents of these big companies. I am sure he never dreamed about attacking the poor little life-insurance agent who happens to have a good year, and sells several good policies, and gets his first-year premiums amounting to more than $17,500. Probably the next year will be a lean year, and in the long run not very many of them get rich. The Senate does not want to attack them, and I should like to appeal to the Senator from Florida to propose, on behalf of the committee, some amendment that will take out from the scope of the section these insurance agents who have inadvertently been included.

Mr. DILL and Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Washington.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I am in favor of the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, as amended, but I do not think it goes far enough when it comes to railroad corporations. I call attention to the fact that the loans being made to some of the railroad corporations have resulted only in making the condition of the roads worse, in many cases. I speak particularly of those loans which have been made to pay interest upon bonds, amounting to, say, $4 or $5 in interest, when the bond is selling on the market at 20 cents on the dollar, making the payment as high as 25 percent upon the purchase price of the bond. Every time we do that, we are simply pouring water into a rat hole, as it were, because we only add to the outstanding securities without any assurance or condition whereby the rate is going to be any better in the future.

Mr. WALSH. What is the Senator's suggestion?

Mr. DILL. My suggestion is that so far as railroads are concerned, there ought to be an additional paragraph providing that no more loans shall be made to railroads until they reduce their capital structures, as the Interstate Commerce Commission shall decide, to such a point that thereafter they can take care of their capital needs and earnings.

Mr. WALSH. I suggest that the Senator offer that as an amendment.

Mr. DILL. I did not know whether it ought to be offered as a part of the pending amendment or as a separate amendment.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, may we have a vote on the pending amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts to the committee amendment.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I rise to express my opposition to the committee amendment, and a still stronger opposition to the amendment to that amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts.

I desire to declare that I do not know enough about the business of corporations, associations, and partnerships—that is, their interworkings and the details of their administration—to vote to fix the salaries of the employees or officers of such corporation. When groups of citizens subscribe for stock in a corporation they select their directors, and their directors select the officers, and I believe that they are much more competent to say how much the services of the officers and employees are worth to the corporation than the Senate is.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LOGAN. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. I should like to point out to the Senator that, of course, this does not apply to any corporation which is not in distress. If a corporation comes here in distress and the officers are having to appeal to the Federal Government for relief for the corporation, it does not seem to me that there is any justification for paying these exorbitant salaries.

Mr. LOGAN. Let me answer the Senator briefly by undertaking to show how little there is in the suggestion which he makes, in my judgment. When an officer is selected it is a question of how much he is worth to the corporation. Some man might be worth $50,000, and his employment at that salary might mean a profit to the corporation by reason of his services, and it would be much better to pay him $50,000 than to dispense with his services. Another man might be dear at $5,000 or $10,000. My position is that we are not sufficiently well acquainted with the affairs of any insurance company to say whether it is worth more to the company to pay more than $17,500 to an officer than it is to pay less.

I just cannot understand why the United States Senate, or the Congress of the United States, should undertake to go out into private business and say, "As a condition precedent to your obtaining a loan from the Government, which you must repay and which must be adequately secured, we are going to tell you how much you can pay your officers."

There is another suggestion I desire to make in connection with this matter. I believe that our country is going through a most serious period in its history. It is a dangerous period. The people are dissatisfied. They do not understand just what is going on, so they believe the worst. To have it said on the floor of the Senate of the United States that we are giving money to certain corporations so that they can pay these large salaries to their officers is not only unfair but it is dangerous. It arouses a feeling among the people that we are not doing our duty. The Government of the United States is not giving any money to these corporations to pay salaries. It is lending money to the corporations, which must be repaid.

It is said that we cut the salaries of Government officials. Very well; we concede that that is true. But those salaries are paid out of money which must be collected in the way of taxes or some other form of revenue. Not so with the private corporation. The money we lend a private corporation has to be returned; it is a loan, and I cannot believe that we are justified at all in invading the private affairs of private corporations and saying that we are going to fix the salaries or that we are going to deny them the privilege of obtaining loans if they do not allow us to regulate and limit the salaries of the employees.

Mr. President, I regret that I seem to be almost alone in this matter. The only controversy seems to be as to whether we will fix the salaries at one sum or whether we will make the salaries less. I have no desire other than to state that I am against attempting to fix them at all.

It is said that the corporations are in distress when they come, and that they are broke. That is not true. It is solvent corporations which are supposed to secure these loans from the Government. It does not mean that when a corporation is forced to borrow money it is insolvent or broke.

We set up the Reconstruction Finance Corporation because there was no place where certain corporations could go and borrow money, and we deemed that it was necessary for those corporations to carry on their business for the best interests of the country. So we created the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to help the people generally—to bring relief to the people.

Now we say that if an insurance company, however much it may need money to carry on its business and save its policyholders from great loss, is going to pay a salary or if it does pay a salary of more than $17,500, then it cannot come and secure any money in the way of a loan from the Government.

Mr. President, that is not the worst thing in the amendment. That which is, to my mind, beyond the comprehension of any reasonable mind is the fact that the concerns which have already borrowed money, which we know they cannot repay at this time, are told now, "You cannot even get an extension of your loan unless you force your officers to resign and go elsewhere or accept greatly reduced salaries."

Mr. President, that is the way I feel about this matter. I think we have gone far enough in the direction of socializing all private business in the United States. Indeed, I believe we have gone entirely too far. We justify the length to which we have gone by saying that there is a great emergency; and that is true. I am perfectly willing to go as far as the next one, but I do feel that we should draw the line somewhere; and when the Congress says to insurance companies, when it says to other business, that the individual citizen cannot himself or that his representative cannot determine how much the services of a particular man are worth as an officer of a company, I think we are going entirely too far. I believe we should not adopt the amendment, and most assuredly that we should not adopt the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts to the committee amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I am opposed to the bill itself, but I think that before any vote is taken on the bill it ought to be perfected as far as possible, in order to eliminate the possibility of abuse so far as we can do that.

If I understood the amendment correctly from the reading, subdivision (1) of the original committee amendment is stricken out entirely; that is to say, the clause reading "until the applicant shows to the satisfaction of the Corporation that it can furnish an amount of new capital equal to that for which application is made to the Corporation." I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts whether that is true.

Mr. WALSH. That is true.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. That has been stricken out?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. What was the reason for striking it out?

Mr. WALSH. The amendment which I offered simply sought to apply the same limit to the salaries of officers of corporations which borrowed from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation that is applied by the committee to officers of insurance companies.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. This particular part of the committee amendment has no reference at all to salaries.

Mr. WALSH. The amendment of the Committee on Banking and Currency has reference to salaries.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The part which I read, which I understand has been stricken out, does not.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if the Senator will excuse me, I think the Senators are speaking of different amendments. Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Perhaps.

Mr. REED. The Senator from Massachusetts is talking about his proposed amendment to the committee amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I understood that was in the nature of a substitute for the committee amendment.

Mr. WALSH. Oh, no!

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Then, I was wrong about that. I have a good deal of sympathy with the statement made by the Senator from Pennsylvania with reference to insurance agents. If an agent is working on a commission basis, of course the better the insurance agent is the more money he will earn, the more business the company will do, and the better off, I suppose, all the policyholders will be as a result. But the bill limits the compensation of executive officers to $17,500.

I do not know whether that figure is sufficiently low or not, but I am making no particular objection to that item, except that I am wondering whether the Senator from Massachusetts would be willing to add to his amendment language which would make it impossible for these insurance executives to receive more than $17,500, not only from the applicant company but from the affiliates as well. My understanding is that many of the abuses come from a practice under which an officer may receive, for instance, $17,500 from the applicant company; and then from some affiliate connected with that company $10,000; then from some other affiliate $5,000, and, after a while, the salaries may aggregate up to $100,000 or $150,000.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, my amendment does not deal with insurance companies at all. The committee amendment does deal with insurance companies. My amendment deals with other companies which borrow from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, would the Senator from Florida, who has this bill in charge, be willing to accept an amendment?

Mr. WALSH. May I call the Senator's attention to this language of the committee amendment, which is the pending amendment, "or other payment, direct or indirect, in money or otherwise, for personal services."

I think the word "indirect" covers the point the Senator has in mind.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KING in the chair). Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. The amendment which I intended to offer, and which I have introduced as a bill three or four times and which I should like to read, I really believe covers the point raised by the Senator.

Mr. WALSH. My amendment was drafted by the drafting service, using the exact language of the committee amendment dealing with insurance companies, simply applying the principle to other companies.

Mr. BLACK. My judgment is that the original amendment was entirely too long and cumbersome to express the idea. My amendment reads:

After the enactment of this act the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is directed to decline to make or extend any loan to any institution or business enterprise and to buy stock in any business enterprise unless an agreement is made that while such loan is outstanding and unpaid such institution or business enterprise either singly or in combination with associated or affiliated companies, individuals, or corporations will pay no salary, or salary combined with bonus, to any officer, agent, or employee in excess of—a certain amount. I certainly think that the point raised by the Senator from Indiana, whatever may be the ultimate form of the amendment, should be taken care of, for the reason that my investigation has shown me—and I have the facts here—that insurance officials will probably be paid salaries by three or four different companies, and the money will be borrowed from the Government.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield, if I have the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana has the floor.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I yield.

Mr. REED. As I read them there is nothing in either the committee amendment or the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts which specifies that the compensation should be received from the applicant. Both amendments refer to any officer, director, or employee receiving compensation at a rate in excess of so much, but they do not say "from the applicant."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I think the next clause, reading "unless at such time the applicant agrees", and so forth, covers that.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I think undoubtedly that language should be incorporated to limit the salary to that paid by the applicant.

Mr. REED. Otherwise the applicant could not hire one of the great and prominent lawyers who would be receiving from all sources an amount in excess of the limitation; and a man could not be an officer of two different corporations.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. My theory is that, if this proposed legislation shall be enacted at all, it must be on the theory that the insurance companies should be saved; and, of course, they are not in a position to pay fees much above $17,500 to lawyers if they are in the economic condition which is represented.

Mr. REED. What I am driving at is this: If the amendment stands, and if it is construed as the Senator from Indiana suggested, it is going to be very easy to evade it. I think it is going to be next to meaningless. I do not believe that they will have the least difficulty getting around it. I do not approve of this procedure at all; but if we are going to adopt it, we might, at least, strengthen it in the way the Senator has suggested.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I agree with the Senator; and I am glad he has that view of it.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Certainly.

Mr. FLETCHER. I cannot see how we can pass a law that will prohibit a man from doing anything else in the world or getting any other employment and that will deny a corporation of which he is president or vice president relief on the ground that he is getting more than $17,500 a year from some source.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. That is just the point; that is precisely what we are trying to do, I assume. We are trying to limit the officers of insurance companies in their right to receive from those companies or their affiliates more than $17,500; otherwise why should we loan the people's money to them?

Mr. FLETCHER. The bill prohibits any corporation making application for a loan from paying to its officers excessive salaries in any way, directly or indirectly. I can see how anyone opposed to the bill, as a whole, can raise the kind of objection which has been raised, but I do not think we could make the specification any plainer than we have done in this bill, that a corporation making application shall not be permitted to pay salaries or compensation, commission, bonus, or in any other way, in excess of $17,500 to its officers or employees. They may earn money outside.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Would the Senator be willing to accept an amendment that would provide that no loan shall be made to any insurance company, any officer or director of which receives more than $17,500 annually from the applicant company or any of its affiliates?

Mr. FLETCHER. If the Senator wants to offer an amendment, I will consider it. What amendment does the Senator propose?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I understand that there are other amendments before the Senate now and that it would not be in order unless the Senator would be willing to accept it; but I would suggest, in line 14, after the word "receiving", that we add the word "total"; in line 15, that we strike out the words "at a rate" and insert the words "in a sum"; and after the comma following the word "annum", that we add "from the applicant and/or any of its affiliates", so that it would read as follows:

If at the time of such subscription, purchase, or acceptance any officer, director, or employee of the applicant is receiving total compensation in a sum in excess of $17,500 per annum from the applicant and/or any of its affiliates.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, for myself I cannot accept the suggested amendment. I think it would only complicate the matter and raise new difficulties. I appreciate the motive and purpose the Senator has in mind.

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not know how the suggestion of the Senator from Indiana would apply to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, but, so far as I am concerned individually, I do not object to it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I understand the Senator from Massachusetts objects to its being incorporated in his amendment.

Mr. WALSH. The difficulty with the Senator's proposal, as I understand it, is that it may prevent a man from getting two or three salaries from outside companies.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Only from affiliates of the insurance company.

Mr. WALSH. I think the language of the committee amendment is sweeping enough.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I am wondering what the purpose of this proposed legislation is, anyway. Why should we loan $100,000,000 to insurance companies when it has been shown on this floor that such companies have been squandering the money of their policyholders which they have been holding in trust? What purpose can there be in loaning them a hundred million dollars in times like these when we have just taken $450,000,000 away from the veterans and $125,000,000 away from Federal workers, whose pay is low to begin with, and when industries everywhere are slashing wages? Why now should we loan $100,000,000 to insurance companies in order to cover up their own weaknesses, some of which I hope to expose in a moment?

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to reply?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Yes; I shall be glad to have the Senator's view.

Mr. LONG. It is to keep within the spirit of the times, to take from the weak and give to the mighty. The Senator has not got the air of the times.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I should like to have a serious answer from the Senator from Florida. What is the emergency?

Mr. FLETCHER. I have said that I do not care to raise objection to the Senator's amendment, so far as I am concerned. The emergency is that there are insurance companies that need this relief. If they should fail, their policyholders would lose the value of their policies, whereas, with a little help by subscribing for preferred stock, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation would restore them and put them upon solid ground; the Reconstruction Finance Corporation itself would be absolutely secured in making the loans, and the policyholders would be saved from serious loss. That is the whole purpose.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President—

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. JOHNSON. The Senator from Indiana is speaking to the bill, and very effectively so. I have an amendment, and I wonder if he would mind if that amendment were presented, considered, and determined? It will not take a great length of time, I am sure, for I am satisfied there will be little opposition to it. In the interim, the chairman of the committee having accepted the amendment of the Senator from Indiana, perhaps there might be agreement on it otherwise. I do not want to inject myself into the discussion if it is going to proceed concerning the particular amendment that originally was offered.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I wish we might dispose of the pending amendment. The Senator from Indiana is not opposed to the amendment. He would like to broaden it, as I understand, and the Senator from Florida states he is willing to broaden it so far as it applies to insurance companies. My amendment does not apply to insurance companies. I should like to have a vote on the amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I have no particular objection to voting on the amendment in a few minutes, but I do want to read a letter which I have just received from a friend of the President with reference to this very matter. I think the writer of the letter points out some facts which the Senate ought to have. However, I shall be glad to yield to the Senator from California for the purpose he expressed. If he desires to offer his amendment at this time, in my time, I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not want to interfere with any amendment pending, but if the discussion was general in character, as it seemed to me to be, then I should like to offer the amendment which I have, which is an amendment germane to the bill, and to which I assume there will be no real objection.

Mr. FLETCHER. If I may interrupt the Senator, I will say that I will be glad to have the Senator's proposed amendment read, but it is not in order to offer it now, because there is an amendment pending.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from California that there is an amendment pending and his amendment would not be in order except by unanimous consent.

Mr. JOHNSON. I quite agree with the Presiding Officer and with the chairman of the committee.

Mr. FLETCHER. I should be glad to have the amendment read for the information of the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON. I will wait; but I thought the discussion was taking a long range, a wide range, and we might get back to an amendment which would be thoroughly germane.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I have here a letter from Harrison Law, an insurance analyst, of Nutley, N.J., written under date of April 7, in which he says:

NUTLEY, N.J., April 7, 1933.

Senator ROBINSON of Indiana,
Washington, D.C.

HONORABLE SIR: I was very much interested in the brief article in the Journal of Commerce treating on the debate on the application to permit the Reconstruction Finance Corporation permission to treat further with the insurance companies. Quite a little space was given to the salaries that are paid to these insurance officials, and especially so when you consider that, while the rank and file of the various insurance companies have been so reduced that they are barely able to live, the salaries of the officials have increased either through direct increase or through affiliates, thus to hide the real condition; or, as in the organization of the Fire Co.'s executive committee, a man was taken from one of the insurance companies—in fact, the man that recommended the formation of this said committee got the job—early last year, when times were so hard, at a salary of $100,000 per year, when he was getting only $52,000 as president of the Continental Fire Insurance Co. Right away he started another movement which gave him a salary in addition to the above of $25,000 as president of the Fire Co.'s adjustment bureau, which through its organization and operation did thousands out of work who had been operating as independent adjusters all over the United States.

These bureaus are affiliates of the National Board of Fire Underwriters, who are the controlling factor of the fire-insurance business in the United States. Many of the fire-insurance companies have been borrowers of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation; and the outcome of the Globe & Rutgers Insurance Co., a company with over $50,000,000 assets and an annual income of premiums alone of $30,000,000, shows that all insurance companies are today in a bad way through their security portfolio; yet we find that, while there were over 30 companies merged or reinsured during 1932, the clerks were the only ones that were affected, as the officials were taken care of in the mergers. In the Firemen's of New Jersey case, Mr. Bassett, the president, gets $25,000 salary from the parent company, and his total of $85,000 is made up through contributions from the affiliation companies. Thus when an investigation was made as to his salary no objection could be made to the payment of a president $25,000 nor $50,000; but, as all the nine companies are operated as a unit, he was operating all companies as the operating executive of the Firemen's—thus doing nothing individually for the other individual unit.

There are more schemes in insurance to give executives high salaries than in any other monetary operation, yet we find that these same are catered to in all conditions of insurance work. We who have been in the business for 40 years or more are thrown out because of our inability to operate with them or because we cannot in some cases do the things that we are expected to.

Our worthy President, Mr. Roosevelt, knows personally of my work both as an insurance man and statistician, he being an ex-insurance official, so what I have said in the above can be confirmed.

In further connection with salaries, your reference to Mutual is one that will soon have to be curbed, as several of the so-called "helpers' aids", such as the Illinois Travelers, are paying exorbitant salaries to their officials and, due to the fact that their membership is so scattered, they know that they are safe from investigation and make their own salaries approved by their dummy directorate.

Yours truly,

HARRISON LAW.

Mr. President, it develops that these abuses are just as grave in the fire-insurance field as they are in the life-insurance field. I read to the Senate the other day a statement of the enormous increases in salaries and compensation of life-insurance presidents and executives. The Metropolitan Life Insurance Co., for example, paid its president in the year 1929, at the peak of the so-called "prosperity", a salary of $175,000, but last year increased that salary to $200,000. That was not an exceptional case. I read into the RECORD a list of insurance companies that had been increasing enormously the fabulous compensation paid to their executives. But that had to do with life insurance. Now I am discussing fire insurance, which apparently is equally bad.

We are faced now with a bill—and it is treated as an emergency—insisting that we authorize the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to loan $100,000,000 to these same insurance companies all over the United States. What difference does it make it we provide that a salary shall not be in excess of $17,500 when there are so many and devious ways of getting around it—for instance, by receiving $17,500 from an applicant company, $10,000 from an affiliate, $10,000 from still another affiliate, and so on. The money does not go to the policyholder at all. He gets nothing. He is "the forgotten man."

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator raises the point that the insurance companies are paying excessive salaries. This is the only proposal before the Senate or before the House which undertakes to correct that condition, and yet the Senator opposes it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. But why give them $100,000,000 at all? The policyholder will not get it or any of it. I challenge the Senator from Florida to show me one cent of that sum that will go to a policyholder.

Mr. FLETCHER. Very likely the insurance companies the Senator has mentioned would never apply to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. They are probably able to carry on their affairs without any assistance from the Government or the Reconstruction Finance Corporation at all. They are companies which will not be on the application list at all.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I challenge the Senator to show me a policyholder who would draw one cent of the $100,000,000, no matter what company it is.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. I think the Senator misunderstands the situation. This money, of course, is not going to the policyholders. It is to protect the insurance companies from defaulting on the outstanding policies.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I recognize that that is what the Senator thinks it will do.

Mr. COUZENS. I know it will be so.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. If that is the Senator's view of the bill, that is the reason why he will favor it.

Mr. COUZENS. It is not a question of view. It is a question of fact.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. My position is, based upon information in my possession, that this money will go only to prop up some of the mismanagement that has been going on in the insurance companies. It will go to overhead for a little while, and then the companies will entirely fail, and we will have the same situation we have already had with regard to several insurance companies.

Mr. COUZENS. The "propping up" is for no other purpose than to prop up the insurance policyholder; because under the bill it is provided that dollar for dollar shall be matched, and those who subscribe to stock take a position secondary to the Government, so that anybody who comes in under the provisions of the bill comes in a secondary position to the Government and will not come in at all if he fears the funds are going to be dissipated.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Even so, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation accepts the stock, and the company can fail just the same. My position is that in the end the policyholder will get no benefit. I think I can demonstrate that when we come to consider the bill proper. The Senator from Michigan is perfectly well aware of the fact that, without any warrant in law at all, many of the life-insurance companies have already suspended the cash-surrender-value provisions of their policies, suspended that part of the contract agreeing to pay cash on surrender of the policies, and are even refusing to make loans on policies. In other words, the policyholder gets nothing.

Mr. COUZENS. That is quite correct; but so has the Federal Government suspended its gold payments upon its bonds that are maturing and upon the coupons that are maturing. If the Federal Government has suspended gold payment contrary to its contract, in just what respect are some of these companies so disreputable because they have suspended certain provisions of their contracts under the exigencies of the situation?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Then they ought to be decent enough to reduce salaries instead of increasing salaries. Instead of increasing the salary of the president of the company from $175,000 to $200,000 a year, as was done in the case to which I have referred, after they have suspended these provisions of their contract and have injured the policyholder to the extent that he can get no money on his policy, they ought to be decent enough to reduce their own salaries instead of increasing them. They ought to be decent enough to reduce the salaries of the executives as they have reduced the wages of their other employees. But that, in the great majority of cases, they have not done.

I appreciate the great value of insurance and have always advocated it most enthusiastically. But I am anxious to protect the policyholders as far as possible against the selfish greed of the company management. That is precisely the reason I am taking the position I do on this bill.

Mr. COUZENS. But this provision does not apply to that kind of companies. If the Senator wants to condemn all insurance companies because some have misbehaved themselves, I could equally condemn the Senator from Indiana because he disagrees with some of his colleagues here. In other words, I object to the condemnation of whole groups because some of the group may have misbehaved. I am not pleading for the bill. I would much prefer to vote for a measure to repeal the whole Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I will join the Senator.

Mr. COUZENS. The only reason given for this is because others who are in no more desirable position than the insurance companies are getting the benefit of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act. If the Senator wants to cut them all out and prevent trying to prop up any of such agencies, I am in favor of doing that, but I see no reason for excluding insurance companies from the operations of the bill when we have already taken care of the banks and railroads.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I think they all ought to be excluded. Furthermore, I think the insurance business in the United States ought to be investigated, as was done by a committee in New York several years ago. That is the situation we have reached in the insurance business. When we come back to the bill, after having disposed of the amendment, I hope to give the Senate some facts on that particular question.

Mr. COUZENS. If the Senator will offer an amendment, a proposal to repeal the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act or to prohibit any further loans by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, I will gladly vote for it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I think that would be a fair proposal. I am in great sympathy with the Senator's views in that direction. I do not care to discuss the matter any further at this time. I am willing to have a vote on the amendment. I understand the Senator from Florida is willing to accept the modification which I suggested.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, in view of what has been said in the course of the debate, I want to speak very briefly.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. COSTIGAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. WALSH. I yield.

Mr. BONE. When the Senator discusses his amendment, and I assume he is going to discuss it now, I wonder if he would mind discussing the angle of the situation suggested by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON], wherein he claims it is possible to pyramid the salaries of officers or executives of insurance companies so as to avoid the application of the provisions of the amendment which the Senator from Massachusetts has offered.

Mr. WALSH. I had not intended to discuss my amendment specifically. I desire to speak upon the general questions raised during the debate.

Mr. President, it has been said many times that the last administration which created the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and the Congress which gave its approval was corporation-minded and corporation-controlled. That impression has spread throughout the country. I desire to inquire if the Congress of the United States for one moment would listen to a proposal to loan the taxpayers' money to a railroad company or an insurance company or a bank owned by one man or two men or a limited group of men? There was no intent or purpose upon the part of Congress to loan the money to any corporation as such; but when we were told that the financial condition of railroads and of banks and of insurance companies was such that millions of Americans would have their savings wiped out because of the drastic character of the depression, because of the low ebb to which the value of securities had descended, then rather than have that catastrophe occur, rather than have that financial chaos in the country, we agreed to make loans from the Public Treasury to protect the depositors in the banks, to help keep solvent the insurance companies, and to help save those who had invested their money—in what? In institutions in which the Government itself has a solemn obligation to prevent insolvency and losses to innocent investors.

Mr. President, I cannot conceive of anything more injurious to America today than the insolvency of the insurance companies. The burden would not come merely upon us of this generation but the children of the next generation would endure unspeakable hardships as a result of the collapse of the insurance companies. To say that we can stand by and allow all the insurance companies, or half of them, or one fourth of them, to go into insolvency, and not lend some aid or assistance, is to invite disaster, is to banish hope, is to put before the next generation nothing other than darkness and despair.

We have not voted to help a single bank as such. We have not voted to help a single insurance company as such. We have not voted to help railroad companies as such. We have voted to preserve the savings of millions of Americans whose savings in these corporations were threatened with being wiped out.

What have we been passing through during this depression? What was the first result of the disastrous character of this depression? First, unemployment, the shutting down of factories, the cessation of business, as a result of which millions of our fellow men and women were made idle and some of them destitute. That was the first step. We sought to grapple with it. We found ourselves powerless. Millions of dollars were appropriated by States, municipalities, and the Federal Government to help bring relief, but we found ourselves lost in the battle to stem the progress of unemployment.

What was the next disastrous result that followed? The next disaster that came was the depreciation of securities and of bonds and of mortgages and of real estate to such an extent that almost every bank in this country, every insurance company in this country, every railroad in this country, was threatened with financial ruin.

What was the third movement in this depression? It was the possible impairment of the credit of the Government itself. That is why we have been talking so much about balancing the Budget. Why? To preserve the credit of the Government itself. Before we reached that stage, however, notwithstanding the abuses that occurred, let it be said to the credit of the man who formerly presided at the White House that he proposed that the Federal Government lend its credit to a certain extent to these financial institutions in order to prevent complete financial chaos. He proposed these loans after seeking the advice of the people of this country who were able to present to him the despair and the sufferings that would come from closed banks and bankrupt insurance companies and from the wiping out of savings. It was bad enough to have unemployment go unrelieved without adding the loss of the dollars that our people had saved through their thrift by the annihilation of their insurance policies, by the insolvency of our banks, by the depreciation of their property. To the credit of President Hoover, let it be said that he proposed, too late—it should have been done a year before—that the Government itself, rather than see these financial institutions wiped out, should loan money upon the frozen assets, the securities of these institutions that they were unable to convert into cash to meet their obligations.

There may have been abuses in the administration of these loans, but Congress is not to blame for them. Congress acted to save from financial chaos and ruin every depositor in the banks, and every policyholder of these insurance companies.

Mr. President, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation has not been the success that many of us wish it might have been, but it did save some of the banks, railroads, and insurance companies from ruin. It did prevent some of the banks and some of the insurance companies and some of the railroad companies from folding up temporarily, at least—temporarily, at least. Whether or not it has permanently saved them remains to be seen.

Now, what is the proposition we have here? To lend more money, a hundred million dollars, to the insurance companies; not to any soulless corporation, but to the men and women who hold policies in companies where they have placed their savings in order to leave something to their loved ones when they have passed out of this life. We are proposing to loan some of the taxpayers' money to save those savings and to save those securities, not because an insurance company is necessarily financially ruined now, but because its assets are not liquid; because its assets are such that today if forced to convert its securities into cash, the company would become bankrupt and the policies would be largely without value.

I refuse to have anybody impute to me that I have used my vote here merely to help soulless corporations. My effort and my desire have been to prevent a second destruction even greater than unemployment; namely, I repeat, the elimination of the savings of the people. That is why we have had to deal—disagreeable as it has been, painful as it has been—with the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, in an effort to save these investments of our people, I repeat, in institutions in which we abandoned our legal and moral obligation to prevent waste and abuses and extravagances.

Now we are proposing to carry that further, because we know, and the Senator knows, and every member of his committee knows, the condition of the insurance companies of this country. He knows that it is a question of the turn of a hand whether many of them would be able to meet the contracts they have made with their policyholders.

Now let us come down to the question before us. Being obliged to go to the Public Treasury for loans which we are granting to protect the policyholders and the depositors in the banks, we say to the companies, "Whatever your mismanagement may have been in the past, whatever abuses you have practiced, whatever extravagance and waste you have indulged in"—and practically all institutions did this during the period of prosperity—"now, because of your distress, and the assistance we are prepared to give you, there must be one abuse eliminated; namely, the salaries you pay must be limited to what is reasonable." That is the proposition and the question we have before us. Shall we, in view of our aid, insist that one abuse, at least—the abuse of large or excessive salaries—be ended?

That is the purpose of my amendment. That is the purpose of the amendment offered by the committee presided over by the Senator from Florida. We could stay here all day and modify it and change it and amplify it, and I am sure some enemies of this legislation would like to spend the afternoon proposing changes and modifications to it, because it would help, perhaps, to destroy the policy of the committee.

I approve the committee amendment. I think they have shown good judgment in applying this limit-of-salaries principle. I hope the Senate will approve the amendment I suggest, which is to apply and broaden the principle proposed by the Senator from Florida on behalf of his committee.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, while the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] was making his very eloquent and most convincing address, I sought to interrupt him simply to state that the reasons he was giving for supporting the Reconstruction Finance Corporation were a fine expression of my own attitude toward the whole proposal. I had never thought that it was in the interest of bankers, but rather in the interest of the depositors in the banks; and, so far as I know, I never voted on behalf of a railroad corporation or management, but rather for the public which depends upon an adequate railroad service, and the people who are employed in that service.

I have this question in mind after we have gone thus far: I have wondered whether we have not bent backward in our efforts. The purpose of the legislation, it seems to me, is thoroughly justified; but I am wondering whether we are not obligating ourselves in such a way that the Government ultimately will have to bear a considerable burden with the railroads, and possibly, though in a different sense, with the banks.

I sympathize fully with what the Senator from Massachusetts has said in reference to the insurance companies. It is probable that more of the savings of the American people are deposited with them than at any other one place; and if disaster to the insurance companies can be prevented by action of the Government, I shall be very quick to join in taking such action. It is a question, however, whether what we are doing will result as we hope it will.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I desire to ask the Senator a question.

If there were a bank large enough to meet the wants of the insurance companies, and they appeared before the president or directors or other officials of that bank and asked for loans, as the insurance companies will come before the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, which is the Government, and ask for loans, the very first thing the banker would want to know would be, "What about your overhead? Is it large? Is it extravagant? Are you paying high salaries?" And under the conditions surrounding the insurance companies as we find them it is probable that no bank and no banker would let them have the money until they agreed beforehand to reduce their overhead.

Is not that exactly the same business principle that we are applying when we authorize the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to make these loans to them? Should we not require the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to make the insurance companies cut down their overhead by the reduction of salaries as provided in this amendment?

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I should like to state to the Senator from Tennessee that I approve what he states in connection with the necessity of a bank always making an investigation as to how money that is being borrowed is to be applied, whether the loan is to be applied to some activity of a productive character, so that the money will in all probability be repaid. Banks are sometimes the subject of criticism if they are too rigid; nevertheless, a bank which does not follow that practice is lending on an unsafe basis. We have come to regard it as the function of the bank to know how money that is borrowed is to be used, and to determine whether, in the judgment of the lender, the investment would be a profitable one. I agree to that extent.

I have some hesitancy in agreeing, I may say to my friend from Tennessee, that it is wise for the Government to undertake to regulate salaries of private institutions. I know the appeal which the Senator has in mind, and it seems to be logical. Personally, I would prefer not to put a limitation of that kind on a borrower, because if a company is competent enough to pay a good salary, it ought not to be denied consideration when it comes to be a borrower. On the other hand, the company which is not capable of paying good salaries might not be a good risk for a lender. That thought must be taken into consideration also.

The idea I had in mind was that the Government, in lending its assistance—and I think it should do that—may be launching into ventures which we in time will rue. Nevertheless, I am uncompromisingly committed to the Government's rendering assistance, if that assistance can prevent the collapse of some great institution, like an insurance company, where possible injury would not be limited to the officers and managers but would be visited on hundreds of thousands of people who would lose their savings. I think we ought to bend backward in our efforts along that line.

When it came to the question of the railroads, I did not have much trepidation about the matter for this reason—that I recognized that the railroads had been financing themselves through borrowings from insurance companies, and that insurance companies are operated under State laws which limit their lending to any corporation which does not show on its returns a certain percentage of profit. When railroads had reached the stage in the collection of revenues where they were deplorably below the State requirements for the lending of money by insurance companies they were facing either bankruptcy or the necessity of finding some other way of refinancing. For that reason I did not hesitate at all. At the same time, everybody must admit that it is a venture, and that none of us knows just how we are coming out.

I give my support to this measure, believing that it is along a line that is justified.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] to the committee amendment.

Mr. AUSTIN. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-nine Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

EMERGENCY RELIEF OF RAILROADS (H.DOC. NO. 32)

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which was read, referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, and ordered to be printed, as follows:

To the Congress:

The steam railways still constitute the main arteries of commerce in the United States. At this time, however, available traffic is not sufficient profitably to utilize existing railway facilities and the supplementary facilities provided by new forms of transportation.

Our broad problem is so to coordinate all agencies of transportation as to maintain adequate service. I am not yet ready to submit to the Congress a comprehensive plan for permanent legislation.

I do believe, however, that three emergency steps can and should be taken at this special session of the Congress.

First. I recommend the repeal of the recapture provisions of the Interstate Commerce Commission Act. The Commission has pointed out that existing provisions are unworkable and impracticable.

Second. Railway holding companies should be placed definitely under the regulation and control of the Interstate Commerce Commission in like manner as the railways themselves.

Third. As a temporary emergency measure, I suggest the creation of a Federal coordinator of transportation, who, working with groups of railroads, will be able to encourage, promote, or require action on the part of carriers in order to avoid duplication of service, prevent waste, and encourage financial reorganizations. Such a coordinator should also, in carrying out this policy, render useful service in maintaining railroad employment at a fair wage.

The experience gained during the balance of this year will greatly assist the Government and the carriers in preparation for a more permanent and a more comprehensive national transportation policy at the regular session of the Congress in 1934.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, May 4, 1933.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, out of order I ask leave to introduce a bill based on the message just read to the Senate, which I request may be printed and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the bill will be received and referred as requested.

The bill (S. 1580) to relieve the existing national emergency in relation to interstate railroad transportation and to amend sections 5, 15a, and 19a of the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

SOLICITOR GENERAL—NOTIFICATION TO PRESIDENT

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, on yesterday we confirmed the nomination of James Crawford Biggs to be Solicitor General, but no motion was made to notify the President. I ask unanimous consent, as in executive session, that the President be notified of that confirmation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears no objection, and the President will be so notified.

EXTENSION OF GASOLINE TAX AND MODIFICATION OF POSTAGE RATES

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment to House bill 5040, to extend the gasoline tax for 1 year and to modify postage rates on mail matter, and for other purposes. I ask that the amendment be printed and lie on the desk. I shall address myself briefly to the purposes of the amendment.

Mr. President, from the farm, the factory, and the wage earner there comes a united cry appealing for relief. The supplications have been continuous since the nations of the world went off the gold standard in September 1931.

These appeals come from every section of the Republic. They were registered here before the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives in January and February 1933. If anyone is in doubt, it would be easy to convince him that what I say is true. Representatives of the farmers, industrial owners, and wage earners alike appeared before the committee, registered their appeals, and waited in despair. The appeals have fallen on fallow soil.

Having lived and devoted my entire life in a profession in the great industrial middle valley section of this Republic wherein five States converge, a section with a population of 21,000,000 people, producing $15,000,000,000 worth of finished manufactured products, producing $1,000,000,000 worth of raw materials annually when there is a fair business condition in our country, I refuse to take second place to any man in arriving at a rightful conclusion as to what a majority of the 125,000,000 people who make up the citizenship of this great Republic need in the way of the adoption of a principle in order to bring us out of the chaos which bewilders us at the present time.

During the past 3 years all kinds of false nostrums have been suggested and adopted by a willing Congress which in their practical application have served like some great stimulant to the flagging heart of a dying man who was being overcome or overwhelmed by the toxins which circulated in his arterial system. This development of a toxic nature arose from some internal disease the cause of which was neither sought for nor dealt with. The administrations have been dealing only with the symptoms, leaving the cause, without any attempt to eradicate it.

Mr. President, the situation of the dying man overwhelmed with toxemia, whose misfortune I have portrayed, is not unlike the situation which confronts our Republic at this time and in the time that has passed since September 21, 1931, when England abandoned the gold standard and many of the other nations of the world followed soon after.

It is true there is another element which enters into the equation that has made the task more difficult and has laid a heavy hand as a contributing factor to the basic cause of our present national distress. We are all familiar with the fact; it affects the smallest and the largest units of government, and even the individual, as I demonstrated in my brief statement by way of explaining my vote on the inflation proposal in the so-called "farm relief bill."

We enjoyed the luxury of going into debt during the World War and the period following up to 1929. To attest the tremendous increase in tax burdens, permit me to refer to the State I have the honor in part to represent and to one county, the home of the greatest soft-coal field in the world, where in 1910, because of my intimate knowledge of the conduct of its fiscal affairs, I personally directed them for a period of 6 years. The yearly cost of that county administration in 1910, with 50,000 population, was $278,885, while in 1920, with a population of 68,571, the expenses were $1,775,268. In other words, Mr. President, there was an increase of only 43 percent in population but an increase of 536 percent in taxes levied.

I was Governor of West Virginia for 4 years, beginning March 4, 1913, and the cost of that 4 years' administration was $13,000,000. The cost of the last 4 years' administration of that State was $55,000,000, an increase of approximately 425 percent.

So it is easy to prove the financial revelry in which the 48 States have participated, beginning in 1910 and ending with the stock-market debacle in 1929, and I doubt not that the same picture can be portrayed as to conditions in every district and unit of Government making up the 48 States of the Union. We are reaping the effects of that dissipation, which has added tremendously to the national burden which so appalls us today. We have been undertaking to cure the malady which is producing the poison by empirical remedies which have been provided by our Federal program, remedies which were initiated under the former administration by the establishment of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and another financial measure to relieve our banking institutions. They have served only as stimulants. The area was too large. There were too many odds; too many leaks. The situation has continued to grow steadily worse.

On the Pacific coast we hear the complaint of the onslaught of imports from Asia; in the East we hear of imports from Canada; in the South we hear of imports from Mexico and the South American states; and we find that in the Middle Atlantic States Europe is dumping her textiles and raw materials; and yet no relief has come, notwithstanding the appeals from the industry owner and the toiler alike, when even the quotations of the importer made impossible the replenishment of vacant shelves by manufactured products.

When the new administration came into power we were told some twelve or thirteen million people were out of employment. Now it is estimated 17,000,000 is the number.

The first act of the new administration was to proclaim the bank holiday; 19,000 banks were closed, and some 6,000 remain closed today, due in many cases to depreciation of secondary reserves that are made up of bonds which when purchased were considered sound; but, because the stock market reflects their depreciation on account of the absolute necessity upon the part of the owner of sacrificing them in order to secure money, they are beaten down from their book value in many instances to one third their real value. No doubt they will be redeemed at their maturity, but the banker must take the loss as reflected on the stock market, and unless he and his associates have laid away something in the way of liquid capital to make good these depreciated values, as reflected in secondary reserves, his bank must stay closed, to his financial ruin and the utter destruction of many who patronize the institution.

The depreciation of stocks and bonds, serving as the best in the way of assets that can ordinarily be transferred into money, is due to the fact that there is a low ebb in business activity due to diminished purchasing power in the United States, and the end of the disaster is not yet in sight.

Legislative measures, one after another, have followed in rapid succession, such as banking, reforestation, dole, farm relief, involving embargoes and processing taxes on all basic farm products essential to the consumer even though he is out of work and out of money. We see as the result the leap in price of necessities of life to heights beyond the purchasing power of the consumer, in consonance, no doubt, with the theory of that great American, Woodrow Wilson, who stated, when he signed the Underwood-Simmons competitive tariff bill, that a great service had been rendered the rank and file, and who, in a speech at Detroit, wanted American industries pitted against the world. In his 14 conditions of peace he demanded that the war be continued until all economic barriers have been removed and vetoed in 1921 an emergency tariff designed to suspend the tariff law he had approved in 1913 that had cut the American pay roll more than $100,000,000 per week.

So the idea today with the successors to the late President Wilson no doubt is competitive tariffs, even to a point of undertaking to cheapen our currency, and in conjunction therewith to solve the problems that confront us at this time by an economic conference with the nations of the world.

The 30-hour work week bill, which has passed this body, provides no protection for the toiler, not even for the reduced wage he will receive by reason of the reduction in his work hours. He may take the shorter period, according to the bill, and with it a reduction of his wage, but nations all around us, with longer hours for labor, with products of every kind and character not unlike the products of our own toilers, may sell their cheaper products to our failing financial consuming public, with their exhausted reserves in the way of purchasing power.

Two amendments were offered for the protection of the industrial worker so that he would be assured of a parity in his home trade despite the reduction of his hours of toil. Inasmuch as he would be compelled by the adoption of the processors' tax to pay a higher price for the food he is able to purchase only at a sacrifice, an amendment was proposed under which American products should be placed on a parity with comparable foreign goods in the home market; but this was refused, Mr. President, by those who were sponsors of the farm relief bill, and by their action our own industrial workers were refused an even opportunity for the products of their toil in the greatest market of the world. With work opportunities failing and drying up in our own land, we refused by our votes to end the progress of this economic disease that has been destroying our own industrial opportunities as a nation, as well as the work opportunities for our toilers since September 1931, notwithstanding the appeals of some of us, beginning as early as April 1932, and the even earlier appeals to the then President of this Republic.

We are now to embark upon an epoch of monetary inflation, notwithstanding we are told by competent authority that there is ample money, through the operation of the Federal Reserve System, to meet any business demand that may develop within the confines of this land. We are to turn a deaf ear to this admonition and cheapen our gold dollar for the first time since the days of those two distinguished Americans, Jefferson and Hamilton, who had so much to do with laying the sound foundation upon which this Government has developed.

As to commercial treaties we are told in advance that plenary power will be asked by the Chief Executive, and under such treaties possibly weeks and months will be taken to mull over and finally arrive at a conclusion, if that be possible, as to the part we shall play in the markets of the world, although in the high tide of business our foreign trade has been only 10 percent of our total production.

How different is the picture presented by the vigilance of Europe in comparison with the attitude assumed by us toward our most sacred responsibility and duty to the welfare of our own people. No sooner had the countries of Europe gone off the gold standard than they set to work to protect what they control in a commercial and economic way.

In order to show the attitude of France since America has gone off the gold standard, I present a news item that appeared in a local newspaper last evening, and ask that it may be incorporated in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GEORGE in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The news item is as follows:

FRANCE WILL TAX AMERICAN GOODS—DECREE WILL BE ISSUED WHEN DOLLAR APPROACHES 20 FRANCS

PARIS, May 3.—The Ministry of Finance has prepared to impose shortly a 15-percent surtax on American goods.

The decree, it was learned, is ready for signature, to be issued when the dollar approaches 20 francs, which officials expect.

This surtax already is effective on British and Japanese goods because of depreciated exchange.

It cannot be increased without parliamentary authority, which Premier Deladier was reported contemplating.

Mr. HATFIELD. By this clipping I wish to stress the sensitiveness, the alertness, and the wisdom of France in taking the utmost precaution to safeguard her domestic market just as soon as the American dollar shows the slightest sign of weakness in foreign markets.

Mr. President, there is no one but admits we have lost our home trade.

The distinguished Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] in discussing the farm relief bill stated that it could only operate successfully by bringing about an embargo. I quote a statement of the senior Senator from Montana as printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 10, 1933, at page 1427. He said:

In order to make the bill effective at all it is necessary to place practically an embargo upon all commodities. If we do not place an embargo on them, it will be impossible to make the bill effective because of the depreciated currencies of other countries.

The senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] made such a fine protective speech on April 28 that I arose from my place here in the Senate to congratulate him, but he declined to yield. His speech, however, turned upon the question of the relief of our toiling millions who are going farther into debt here at home by embarking upon an extensive plan of public construction, thereby swelling our national debt that has been heaped to full measure and is running over at the colossal sum of $21,000,000,000.

On that occasion, the Senator from Wisconsin said:

For more than 2 years I have advocated inflation, but an inflation based upon a program to put people back to work and thus to restore mass purchasing power; for, if I may make bold to say so, I think that those who rely upon inflation alone to remedy conditions such as now confront us have become too enamored of the quantitative theory of money.

The same principle has guided me, Mr. President, ever since I have been a Member of this body, or, at least, since the debacle in the stock market in 1929. From that day down to the present time I have been interested to know whether or not the tariff rates which we adopted in the tariff legislation in 1930 were protective. In many instances I found they were, while in a few instances I found that some of the tariff rates were too low to encourage new industries, such as the chemical industry, which is a comparatively new one under the Stars and Stripes.

In connection, Mr. President, with the embargo legislation dealing with farm products, I undertook by an amendment submitted by me to put the American wage earner upon a parity with the farmer, so that the two might go hand in hand, as they must necessarily go if there is to be relief from the great depression which exists in America today.

I favor the same kind of legislation in dealing with the 30-hour week bill. I was for the measure in principle, but against it as it appeared upon the floor of the Senate, for the reason that it denied the American wage earner his opportunity to toil longer hours, but reduced him to 6 hours a day, with no protection whatever thrown about him so far as the stipend he was to receive for his labor is concerned. Not only that, but it tied his hands to the Canadian, to the Mexican, to the European, and to the Asiatic, and deprived him more and more of his opportunity to toil in the industries of America, and finally reduced his purchasing power to the bare necessities, thereby depriving him of purchasing other products not entering into everyday consumption.

It is the margin of wage paid over and above that necessary for mere existence that creates prosperity by providing additional employment in many lines of industry which cannot be classified under the three necessities—food, shelter, and clothing.

No one can foresee at this hour the destiny of our Government, because, Mr. President, the history of the present era is not unlike the history of that period when the Tower of Babel was built, when the confusion of tongues took place and no workmen could understand. We are confronted with so many doctors and so many nostrums that it seems to me our pitiful plight today is looked upon by the whole world in dismay. If we would only do the simple thing under our control, then some contentment would come. More relief than by all the treaties and economic conferences of Europe and Asia in one blessed hour would come from an act of Congress that would protect our home markets for our home people in whatever way is necessary. Then internal improvements could be considered to relieve the rest, and there would be something coming in from the already overburdened taxpayer, who would willingly contribute as far as his ability to do so would permit if he were only given a chance to earn and to be employed and to contribute as he has always patriotically done. The bonds that were sold to save Europe and which he purchased that are now to be paid in 50-cent dollars furnish an example of his patriotism.

We should awaken to a realization that all the world, our own blessed land excepted, has long since adopted as its foundation stone the law of self-preservation that both charity and protection begin at home.

Mr. President, the situation which confronts us at this hour is deplorable and has been so well portrayed by that distinguished American, Dean Donham, of the Harvard Business School, in his colloquy with the Englishman, that I venture to quote it again. He said:

I am aware that I am accused of narrow nationalism, of advocating even cultural isolation. Neither criticism is one to which I can assent. I agree with an eminent Englishman who recently said to me, "The best service you can do for Europe is to work out your own problems." Speaking specifically about that greatest curse of modern civilization, unemployment, he went on, "It is too late for us to originate solutions in England, it is too late on the Continent. It is not yet too late, but soon will be, in America. It may not yet be too late for us in Europe to learn from your experience." Still speaking specifically of unemployment, but for myself, I have no hope we can work out this problem except by isolating it at our national border, beyond which understanding and control cease.

Mr. President, this amendment, which I have been advocating since April 1932 in dealing with Europe and Asia, has for its purpose the American Congress dealing with Asia and Europe as they have dealt with us.

The diagnosis that confronts us today is, first, too much extravagance in Government; and, second, too much war; third, basic, and last, too many imports and too many quotations anywhere from 30 percent to 60 percent lower from Europe and Asia, which have dealt a deathblow to our industry and deprived the American wage earner of work opportunities because of our failure to give him an equal opportunity in the great race for the greatest trade on the face of the globe.

The Federal Reserve System shows a circulation today of $6,319,364,000, with three billion of fiat money made available. With the President given the power to devalue the gold dollar one half, the administration is making available additional circulating medium of money amounting to $7,000,000,000, a majority of the Congress and the Executive taking the position that we need more money and cheaper money—cheaper money for two reasons: First, get the money to the people; second, match the cheap money of other countries; which means pressing down upon the brow of labor a standard of environment on a parity with the conditions found in Europe and Asia—an attempt which in my judgment the American laboring man will resist until the last, if I am any judge of his patriotism to his country and his devotion to his home.

This seems to be the conviction of the administration, while the Federal Reserve System takes the position that it is not additional money that is needed, but more activity in industry. I make this statement based upon the fact that on February 28 the money held by the Federal Reserve amounted to $1,632,540,000. Since that time there has been a cancellation, taking out of the circulating medium of the country $500,000,000, the Federal Reserve Board proceeding on the theory that, due to the lack of business, we need less money. No doubt they take the position that there is only one way to get money to the individual, and that is that he must do something to earn the money. To accomplish this we must have a spurring up of the wheels of industry which will employ labor and will give labor purchasing power. Either the Congress and the Executive in their forecasts are wrong or the Federal Reserve System is wrong.

We heard last week from the lips of the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS] that only two industries were entitled to credit: One the brewery and the other the bottling industry, the one largely depending upon the other, for the reason that there were only two industries that had a demand for their products. It seems to me, Mr. President, that the Federal Reserve System has proven that its contentions are right. Could we by the adoption or some legislation start the great steel and other basic industries, that in turn would call from the mines, the factories, the forests, and the furnace the products essential to these industries, then more credit would be made available by the Federal Reserve System, who are in position, we are told by the distinguished Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], to expand the currency to the extent of more than $4,000,000,000.

There is only one way that this can be accomplished, Mr. President. This situation I have been pointing out at every opportunity, even at the risk of being tiresome. What the country needs today is more business, not more money. What it needs today is embarkation upon a policy that will get the money to the individual man. The only way to accomplish that is to furnish him employment, and then by the sweat of his brow he will earn and will receive. The distribution will then take place. Then, Mr. President, will credit be established, and the circulating medium which makes possible happy and contented homes will then come.

The only way for Congress to accomplish this is to stimulate by law or regulation something that they control. There are two things outstanding and important to solve this condition. The first is to give the home trade to the American toiler. The second is to create work opportunities by internal improvements of a governmental nature.

The justification for these internal improvements to the taxpayer would be to create a protected market so that he would be enabled to bear the taxes levied for this additional burden. If the home trade had been assured and were assured to American industry, these public works for the purpose of reducing the ranks of the unemployed would be rendered unnecessary and certainly would be reduced to a minimum at the present time should the first policy be adopted.

If one group of producers is entitled to this consideration, surely another group is also. The first group and the only group that we have protected, the farm group, is wholly dependent upon the manufacturing group for the profitable sale of his products to industrial workers. If, as the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] pointed out, the only way the farmer can be protected is to bring about an embargo because of the depreciated currencies of Europe and Asia, this same principle will apply to the manufacturers of raw materials and finished products industrially—not to the point of an embargo, but to the point of an equal opportunity to serve. Europe and Asia, because of our own neglect, have driven our manufacturing industries to the point of ruin and destruction. They dare not operate, they dare not produce, unless they have a sealed and signed order. They dare not create a surplus because of the ability of the European and the Asiatic to undersell them 30 to 60 percent, driving them out of their own home market whose consuming power they ordinarily enjoy. In other words, Mr. President, the result would be a general paralysis in business that we are going to cure by having less business, by creating more money, by economical conferences.

What my amendment proposes to do is to encourage home industries by giving to them an advantage over or at least an equal opportunity with other nations in the home market. Had I my way about it, I would give to each and every workman, each and every industry in this Republic, at least the advantage of the home market. But due to the attitude of the Democratic Party and due to its liberality, its fundamental conviction regarding home trade, that it should be subjected to the competitive markets of the world regardless of the wage, regardless of the character of money paid to those who produce these competitive products with our home production, I feel I shall do more, indeed, accomplish a great achievement for the American people, if I am successful in bringing about a parity between the European and the home producer in their equal competition for our home trade.

The amendment which I am presenting is in two parts. Sections 5, 6, and 7 are what are usually referred to as a "depreciated-currency amendment." Section 8 confers a new and different power on the President, and sections 9 to 12 contain provisions which carry into effect sections 5 to 8.

Although the question of the injury to our industries through depreciated currencies of other countries has been a live question since the latter part of 1931, it has never been directly voted on by the Senate.

In the House, in the Seventy-second Congress, hearings were twice held, and in that Congress a vote was had on a motion to discharge the committee. Since those hearings and that vote the question which was most bitterly controverted has been practically decided. It is no longer contended that depreciated currencies of other countries do not injure our commerce.

Many Senators on both sides of the aisle have stated that such injury has occurred, is occurring, and will occur; and one of the arguments—in fact, probably in the minds of some the chief argument—in favor of the Thomas amendment to the farm relief bill was that if we depreciate our currency, either by expansion of the amount of paper money in circulation or by reduction of the gold content of the dollar, it will bring about a condition which will give us a weapon against the effect of the depreciated currencies of other countries.

With the fact conceded that the depreciated currencies of other nations injure us, the question now is the best way to meet the competition caused by such depreciated currencies.

I know it is not necessary for me to recite the misery which exists in our country, and which could be very largely relieved if our factories were open. Practically every Senator who spoke at all during the Seventy-second Congress or who has spoken during this Congress has alluded to our grave situation.

Each of us sincerely wishes that the best solution be arrived at, and be arrived at speedily.

It is in that sense, and that sense only, that I speak.

I take up first the proposition that we can relieve the situation by depreciating our own currency. That proposition is easily disposed of. This is not a question of increasing our export trade, but of protecting our home manufacturers.

The argument is that by depreciating the currency we can reduce our cost, so as to prevent low-cost foreign goods from coming into our country. This is an argument in favor of still further lowering the American standard of living.

In addition there is no proof behind the assertion. Who is there here that can guarantee that the American workman will supinely consent to the reduction of his standards of living through the reduction of his wage? The exact contrary is the fact.

On April 27 I caused to be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the statement of Hon. William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, which pointed out that if, when, and as American depreciated currency caused a rise in price of commodity products the American workingman would insist on an increase in wage sufficient to maintain his American standard of living.

I do not favor a reduction of the American standards of living, and therefore I do not favor this argument of shutting out imports from depreciated-currency countries by reducing our standards of living through the reduction of wages.

With that question out of the way, the remaining method is legislation which will make our rates of duty mean what they say; in other words, legislation which simply restores the real figures of the Tariff Act of 1930 by imposing a tax in addition to the duties collected under the existing law equal to the difference of the invoiced value of the article expressed in the units of value of currency of such foreign country, and converted to units of currency of the United States at the standard value of currency of such foreign country as proclaimed by the Secretary of the Treasury on October 1, 1931.

This amendment has these merits:

First. It does not require any Senator who is opposed to an increase in the tariff to do violence to his principles. The rates in the Tariff Act of 1930 are the rates assumed to be levied by law; and all my amendment proposes is to make those rates real, and in no part paper rates, as they now are.

Second. The reimposition of the Tariff Act of 1930 will reopen various industries, such, for instance, as the fishing industry on both the Atlantic and the Pacific coasts.

Third. The making real of the 1930 rates will give our country the advantage in the coming Economic Conference of having those rates as a base from which to negotiate. At present, as to all countries which have depreciated currency, our tariff rate against imports from those countries is the 1930 rate, less a cut equal to the amount by which the currency of such countries is depreciated from its October 1, 1931, standard.

For example, the Japanese yen has depreciated about 60 percent from that standard; our tariff against Japanese manufactures has been cut 60 percent, and consequently our markets are being flooded with the products of Japanese workers, with the result that our workmen are unemployed and our factories closed.

An economic conference means barter, exchange of trade privileges.

The effect of making our rates real is simply to give our representatives something real to trade with.

Unless this legislation is passed, it is useless for our representatives to discuss the tariff question at all with any depreciated-currency country.

Fourth. Where a situation is quite common to all industrial nations of the world, it avoids many questions. The remedy we should adopt is the same remedy which other nations similarly situated have already adopted. France, Belgium, Germany, and Canada, among others—all suffering from the competition of depreciated-currency countries or, in the case of Canada, from the competition of countries with currencies more greatly depreciated than her own depreciated currency—have all passed depreciated-currency legislation.

It is a remedy recognized as effective, is well understood, and in common use.

No argument is necessary to demonstrate either its usefulness or necessity.

Section 8 confers a new and very necessary power upon the Tariff Commission and the President.

Experience has taught us that some of the imports which are throwing our workmen out of employment and closing our factories are from gold-standard and depreciated-currency countries where our tariff rate is too low.

Section 8 adopts as a policy increased duties or new duties, as the case may be, to increase employment in any industry, and makes the Tariff Commission, with the approval of the President, the agent or instrument to put into effect this policy, enabling it to proceed on its own motion as well as upon the filing of petitions and adoption of resolutions by either the Senate or House, and, when satisfied by the evidence before it that such increased duty or new duties, as the case may be, will increase employment in any industry, to report to the President increased duties to effect that purpose. It relieves the Commission from the duty of being meticulously exact, and authorizes duties of 50, 75, or 100 percent, whichever the proof before it shows to be the nearest to the rate which the Commission finds necessary to increase employment in the United States.

In other words, this provision confers authority upon the Tariff Commission, with the approval of the President, to such an extent that it will be possible for the Commission to initiate proceedings and make a report, which may be approved by the President on the same day.

This power is similar to that possessed by the Canadian Council, the British Board of Trade, and the corresponding governmental bodies in France, Belgium, and Germany. Why should not the Tariff Commission and the President have this power?

We are all interested in increasing employment in every American industry.

Congress has not hesitated to confer many powers on the President during this session of Congress. Why withhold from him the power on the report of a Commission consisting of 3 Democrats and 3 Republicans, to increase any duty, or to impose a new one, in order to carry out our expressed policy to increase employment in industry?

It is difficult to imagine, in the face of what we have so far done this session, what answer can be interposed to this suggested grant of power.

The amendment is an American amendment, intended to protect in their employment American workmen now employed; to reemploy some American workmen now unemployed; to open many a factory, once active, but now idle; and to provide an additional market for the products of the fishery, the forest, the mine, and the farm.

Mr. President, the amendment which I have sent to the desk and ask to have printed and remain on the desk is to be offered when the gasoline tax bill, H.R. 5040, is reported from the Finance Committee. It deals with giving to the Tariff Commission and the President of the United States the same plenary power in dealing with other economic and industrial problems that has been given to the President by the Congress of the United States. When the opportunity presents itself for me to go back and bring up my record, beginning in April 1932, and present to Congress the experience I have assembled in the way of facts, I am convinced that Congress will adopt this amendment. When it does adopt the amendment Congress will solve more satisfactorily the great problem which confronts the industries of America today, and will bring more gladness to the heart of each and every American wage earner, thus substituting patriotism for internationalism.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

TARIFF ADJUSTMENTS TO MEET DEPRECIATED FOREIGN CURRENCIES

Mr. DILL. I submit an amendment intended to be proposed by me to the bill (H.R. 5040) to extend the gasoline tax for 1 year, to modify postage rates on mail matter, and for other purposes. I ask that the proposed amendment may be referred to the Committee on Finance, printed in the usual form, and also printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the proposed amendment was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the usual form and in the RECORD, as follows:

At the end of the bill add a new section, as follows:

"Sec. 5. That part II of title III of the Tariff Act of 1930 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"Sec. 342. Duties to offset depreciation in currency: (a) Whenever the President shall find, in the case of any foreign country the value of whose currency is depreciated 5 percent or more below the standard value of such currency as proclaimed by the Secretary of the Treasury on October 1, 1931, that by reason of such depreciation the relationship between the cost of production of domestic articles and like or similar articles imported from such foreign country is unduly affected, and that substantial injury is thereby caused to domestic producers, he shall, when he finds that the public interest will be served thereby, by proclamation specify and declare such new or additional rate or rates of duty as he shall determine will be necessary to restore a relationship between (1) the landed cost (including duties under this section and other provisions of this act) of such articles imported from such countries, and (2) the cost of production (ascertained as provided in section 336 of this act) of like or similar domestic articles, which will be, as nearly as may be, the same as that which existed during the year prior to the time such depreciation commenced; and on and after 10 days after the date of any such proclamation such new or additional rate or rates of duty so specified and declared in such proclamation shall be levied, collected, and paid upon such imported articles.

"(b) At any time after 6 months from the date of any proclamation issued under subdivision (a) the President shall, if he finds that any such new or additional rate of duty is no longer necessary, or is greater or less than is necessary, to prevent substantial injury to domestic producers, by proclamation specify and declare either removal of such additional or new rate of duty or such reduction or increase therein as may be deemed advisable in the light of such finding; and such removal, increase, or reduction shall take effect upon the expiration of 10 days from the date of such proclamation.

"(c) It shall be the duty of the Commission to make such investigations and reports as the President may request to enable him to carry out the provisions of this section."

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I call attention to the fact that the French Government now proposes to levy a special tariff of 15 per cent on our products unless the dollar is brought back to its full value.

ADMINISTRATION OF OATHS BY MEMBERS OF INTERNATIONAL TRIBUNALS

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Out of order, I ask leave to introduce a bill authorizing commissioners or members of international tribunals to subpoena witnesses and compel their attendance, and for other purposes. I ask that the bill be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I make no objection; but I should like to ask the Senator from Arkansas whether that question is not so peculiarly judicial in character that the bill ought to go to the Committee on the Judiciary. I have no objection at all to its reference to the other committee.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I shall not object to changing the reference if the Senator wishes to see that done. I ask that the reference be to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that reference will be made.

The bill (S. 1581) to amend the act approved July 3, 1930 (46 Stat. 1005) authorizing commissioners or members of international tribunals to administer oaths, etc., was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

RELIEF OF INSURANCE COMPANIES

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1094) to provide for the purchase by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation of preferred stock and/or bonds and/or debentures of insurance companies.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], as modified, to the amendment of the committee. The amendment as modified will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 3, after line 25, it is proposed to insert:

SEC. 4. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation shall not make, renew, or extend any loan under the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, as amended, or under the Emergency Relief and Construction Act of 1932, (1) if at the time of making, renewing, or extending such loan any officer, director, or employee of the applicant is receiving compensation at a rate in excess of $17,500 per annum, and (2) unless at such time the applicant agrees to the satisfaction of the Corporation not to increase the compensation of any of its officers, directors, or employees to any amount in excess of $17,500 per annum while such loan is outstanding and unpaid. For the purposes of this section the term "compensation" includes any salary, fee, bonus, commission, or other payment, direct or indirect, in money or otherwise for personal services.

The amendment, as modified, to the amendment, was agreed to.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I understand that the Senator from Florida accepts the amendments I suggested. If they have not been formally offered, I offer them formally at this time.

Mr. FLETCHER. Let the amendments be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. The Senator from Indiana proposes the following amendments to the amendment of the committee:

On page 3, line 14, after the word "receiving", insert the word "total."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. Also, on page 3, line 15, it is proposed to strike out the words "at a rate" and insert "in a sum."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On the same line, on the same page, after the words "per annum" and the period, it is proposed to insert "from the applicant and/or any of its affiliates."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is upon the amendment of the committee, as amended.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I desire to suggest the correction of one or two typographic errors.

On page 2, line 4, I move to strike out "except" and insert "exempt."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FLETCHER. And I think there is a verbal correction in line 17, page 3, of the print. The word "corporation" means "corporation", of course. I move that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will be made. Are there further committee amendments?

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I offer the following amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. The Senator from California proposes the following amendment: To insert at the proper places the following sections:

SEC. —. That the second and third sentences of paragraph (6) of section 201 (a) of the Emergency Relief and Construction Act of 1932, as amended, are hereby amended to read as follows: "Obligations accepted hereunder shall be collateralized (a) in the case of loans for the repair or reconstruction of private property, by the obligations of the owner of such property secured by a paramount lien except as to taxes and special assessments on the property repaired or reconstructed, or on other property of the borrower, and (b) in the case of municipalities or political subdivisions of States or their public agencies, including public-school boards and public-school districts, by an obligation of such municipality, political subdivision, public agency, public-school board, or public-school district. The Corporation shall not deny an otherwise acceptable application for loans for repair or construction of the buildings of municipalities, political subdivisions, public agencies, public-school boards, or public-school districts because of constitutional or other legal inhibitions affecting the collateral."

SEC. —. The fourth sentence of paragraph (6) of section 201 (a) of such act, as amended, is hereby amended by striking out the period at the end thereof and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "in case of loans made under clause (a) of this paragraph, and not exceeding 20 years in case of loans made under clause (b)."

SEC. —. The fifth sentence of paragraph (6) of section 201 (a) of such act, as amended, is hereby amended by striking out the period at the end thereof and inserting in lieu thereof a comma and the following: "and, in case of loans made under clause (b), shall be deemed to be so secured if, in the opinion of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, such loans will be repaid from any source, including taxation, within a reasonable period, not exceeding 20 years."

SEC. —. The seventh sentence of paragraph (6) of section 201 (a) of such act, as amended, is hereby amended to read as follows: "The aggregate of loans made under clause (a) shall not exceed $5,000,000, and the aggregate of loans made under clause (b) shall not exceed $12,000,000."

SEC. —. The first sentence in section 201 (a) of such act, as amended, which follows paragraph (6) thereof is hereby amended by striking out the period at the end of such sentence and inserting in lieu thereof a comma and the following: "except that for the purposes of clause (b) of paragraph (6) of this subsection a project shall be deemed to be self-liquidating if the construction cost thereof will be returned by any means, including taxation, within a reasonable period, not exceeding 20 years."

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, this amendment has a single purpose. It is to enable municipalities and school districts to borrow from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation the sums which may be deemed appropriate by the Corporation for the rebuilding of schoolhouses in the devastated area in southern California, that devastation resulting from the recent earthquake. It happens, unfortunately, that in that disaster the schoolhouses in the district affected by the earthquake all were either wholly destroyed or damaged sufficiently to require their complete razing. It was assumed that some relief had been accorded by an amendment to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act in a bill which was passed by the House and by the Senate, but the Corporation ruled that it was impossible under the law to lend for the purpose of reconstructing or rehabilitating these various schoolhouses.

Mr. President, if Senators desire to see an illustration of the havoc that was wrought I have a series of photographs before me showing how the disaster affected the schools of that region. What they ask now is that they may be permitted to obtain loans upon their security, just exactly as loans are accorded upon securities of various other institutions, activities, and municipalities which may require them, and that they shall be accorded a sufficient sum to rehabilitate and rebuild the schoolhouses which have been destroyed.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Reading the amendment proposed by the Senator, it appears to me that there is no limitation as to area on the loans which may be made to municipalities or political subdivisions, including school boards and school districts; in other words, while the Senator has said that the object is to enable school districts in southern California to secure funds with which to replace buildings damaged or destroyed by the earthquake, it seems to me that the amendment is so general that any school district in the United States which wished to build or repair a building might make application and stand on an equal footing, so far as the language of the amendment is concerned, with any school district in the earthquake area.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, first answering what has been said by the Senator from Arkansas as to limitations, on page 3, line 3, the limitations in amount are fixed by the language:

The aggregate of loans made under clause (a) shall not exceed $5,000,000, and the aggregate of loans made under clause (b) shall not exceed $12,000,000.

As to the purpose generally we are amending paragraph 6 of the law. Paragraph 6 reads:

To make loans to nonprofit corporations, with or without capital stock, organized for the purpose of financing the repair or reconstruction of buildings damaged by earthquake in the year 1933 and deemed by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation economically useful.

It is not unnatural that the Senator should have overlooked that provision, because it was an amendment to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, which was passed quite hurriedly, as a matter of relief to the earthquake district just after the earthquake occurred.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield.

Mr. FESS. Is not the section which the Senator just read broad enough to include what he wants to do?

Mr. JOHNSON. No; the Reconstruction Finance Corporation has ruled explicitly that it will not cover it, and, while I do not speak authoritatively—although my colleague in Congress, the Representative from Long Beach, can—the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is not averse, as I understand, to this measure. Indeed, a part of it was transcribed or written by the counsel for the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and written partly by the legislative counsel of the House.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield.

Mr. KING. I want to repeat, if I may be permitted to do so, the suggestion made by the able Senator from Arkansas.

It seems to me that this amendment would not be restricted to the region to which the Senator from California refers, and the Senator will have in mind the fact that there has been considerable propaganda brought to the attention of the Senate, at least to the attention of some Members of the Senate, in favor of the Federal Government making extensive loans for the building of schoolhouses and the repairing of schoolhouses. In other words, the school districts and the States, counties, and local communities are now trying, it seems to me, to unload upon the Federal Government a duty and responsibility which belongs to the States.

One other suggestion. A subcommittee has been appointed to consider a bill which is now pending in the Committee on the Judiciary. I happen to be chairman of the subcommittee. That bill calls for measures which will relieve municipalities of their obligations, and the Senator must know that a large number of municipalities now have defaulted upon their bonds, not only in the payment of interest but in the payment of principal.

There is no protection in the amendment offered by the Senator, and it seems to me that even if municipalities have defaulted or may default in their bonds, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is bound to accept them as collateral, regardless of the fact that repudiation of the bonds may promptly follow.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, the query presented, outside of the very excellent remarks made by the Senator from Utah, was as to restricting to the devastated area, as I understand, the particular expenditures. That is my desire. I should like to see that accomplished.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I wish to reiterate the statement I made a few moments ago. If the amendment is restricted so as to make certain that it will apply only to the earthquake area, I shall not oppose it; but the language which is actually employed in the amendment is so broad that, whatever may have been the provisions and purposes of the original measure which is sought to be amended, this language would warrant an interpretation that it authorizes loans to school boards generally.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I am very glad to accept the suggestion of the Senator from Arkansas; but may I remind him again that I have in my hand the joint resolution which added a new paragraph to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act. It amended paragraph 6. It is an addition to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation power, and it reads:

6. To make loans to nonprofit corporations, with or without capital stock, organized for the purpose of financing the repair or reconstruction of buildings damaged by earthquake in the year 1933 and deemed by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation economically useful.

If we turn to the amendment I have submitted, it will be found that we first amend the second and third sentences—that is, the two sentences following that which is descriptive of the purpose of the original amendment; then we follow with the fourth sentence of paragraph 6, amending it, then with the fifth sentence of paragraph 6, and in each instance the purpose of paragraph 6 is described in the first sentence, and none of it is attempted to be modified or altered in any degree.

I should be very glad, however, because we have but a single purpose here, to place in the amendment any restriction which may be suggested by the Senator from Arkansas or the Senator from Ohio, who have spoken to me upon the subject, or any other Senator, so that the amendment may apply alone to the area affected by the earthquake.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I think it could be easily provided for by attaching a proviso.

Mr. JOHNSON. Will not the Senator suggest the proviso?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I think the language suggested by the Senator, if incorporated in his amendment, would accomplish the purpose I have in mind. I have had little opportunity of studying the proposition, but the more

I read it the greater appears the uncertainty that it is limited to earthquake areas.

Mr. JOHNSON. Would not the Senator make a suggestion as to where he thinks the change should come appropriately? I will be very glad to insert it, because the only purpose I have is the one I have stated.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Would this meet the situation, to add a final sentence, reading as follows:

Nothing herein contained shall apply to any area except the area defined in the first sentence of paragraph 6 of section 201 (a) of the Emergency Relief and Construction Act of 1932, as amended.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I think that would serve the purpose. I was just about to make a similar suggestion.

Mr. JOHNSON. I should be very glad to perfect my amendment by adding the words suggested by the Senator from Michigan. Will not the Senator give that addition to the clerk?

Mr. VANDENBERG. To add the following language at the end of the amendment:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall apply to any area except the area defined in the first sentence of paragraph 6 of section 201 (a) of the Emergency Relief and Construction Act of 1932, as amended.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think that very much improves it; otherwise, it would be too broad.

Mr. JOHNSON. I accept the amendment.

Mr. FLETCHER. The question in my mind is whether the words "Provided, That nothing herein contained" could be construed to refer to the section to which it is added or to the whole act.

Mr. VANDENBERG. It could read "nothing contained in this amendment."

Mr. COUZENS. Or "in this section."

Mr. VANDENBERG. There are several sections.

Mr. JOHNSON. What is the last section of the bill, may I ask the Senator from Florida?

Mr. FLETCHER. The last section of the bill is section 5.

Mr. JOHNSON. Very well. My amendment, then, would embrace section 6, section 7, section 8, section 9, and section 10; and the amendment to the amendment should be made specific and apply to this amendment.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Then the amendment would read, Mr. President:

Provided, That nothing contained in sections 6, 7, 8, 9, or 10 shall apply to any area except the area defined in the first sentence of paragraph 6 of section 201 (a) of the Emergency Relief and Construction Act of 1932, as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as modified.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from California a question.

Mr. JOHNSON. Will the Senator permit me to number the sections? They are not now numbered.

Mr. KING. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSON. I modify the amendment by numbering the sections, respectively, 6, 7, 8, 9, and 10.

Mr. KING. I inquire of the Senator from California what he understands to be the meaning of the words "obligations accepted hereunder shall be collateralized (a) in the case of loans for the repair or reconstruction of private property"? What is meant by "private property" in this instance?

Mr. JOHNSON. That is a mere rewriting of the law; the language is not changed at all.

Mr. KING. It is not the introduction of a new element of obligation?

Mr. JOHNSON. No. Here is the law that has been passed—I will ask the Senator to follow me—on the point to which the Senator has just referred:

Obligations accepted hereunder shall be collateralized (a) in the case of loans for the repair or reconstruction of private property.

That has already been passed and this is just a rewriting of it.

Mr. KING. I might add that I think it a very unwise provision to give the credit of the Government of the United States for such private purposes.

Mr. JOHNSON. But it has been written in the law.

Mr. KING. I should like to make a further inquiry. I ask the Senator whether or not the school districts or the municipalities have defaulted in the payment of their bonds or interest?

Mr. JOHNSON. The Representative in Congress from that district tells me not one has done so.

Mr. KING. Is the credit, then, of these cities and municipalities and school districts good?

Mr. JOHNSON. It is good except for the times; that is all.

Mr. KING. Because, as I said a moment ago, with a large number of municipalities which unfortunately are, or, at least, they claim to be, bankrupt and are appealing for relief and want to go into bankruptcy, it would seem a little unjust if we were to extend credit to corporations that were already bankrupt and were defaulting upon their obligations.

Mr. JOHNSON. These are not in that category.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from California, as modified.

The amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment which I think the Senator from Florida will be willing to accept when I explain it.

When we passed the bankruptcy bill permitting the railroads to go into court and have trustees appointed to manage the properties during the pendency of the proceedings we made no provision for the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to loan money to such trustees. The law already provided that loans might be made to receivers. On March 19, Mr. Jesse Jones, the acting chairman of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, wrote me a letter calling attention to this fact, and said he thought the legislation clearly implied the intent of Congress that such loans should be made but that there was nothing in the statute that authorized the Corporation to make such loans. I have drawn an amendment which I think meets that situation which I will send to the clerk's desk and ask to have read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Washington will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. At the proper place in the bill it is proposed to insert the following:

That an act entitled "An act to provide emergency-financing facilities for financial institutions, to aid in financing agriculture, commerce, and industry, and for other purposes", approved January 22, 1932, and amended by an act approved July 21, 1932, be further amended by adding at the end of section 5 thereof the following: "Provided further, That the Corporation may make said loans to trustees of railroads which proceed to reorganize under section 77 of the Bankruptcy Act of March 3, 1933."

Mr. DILL. Section 5 is the section which provides for loans to railroads and to receivers.

Mr. FLETCHER. I can see no objection to the amendment; I think it makes a very proper correction. As the Senator has stated, the law applies to receivers of railroads, and I see no reason why it should not apply to trustees under that act. Furthermore, it seems to be favored by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and I have no objection to it.

Mr. DILL. I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD as a part of my remarks a copy of a letter from Mr. Jones to myself under date of March 19.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RECONSTRUCTION FINANCE CORPORATION,
Washington, March 19, 1933.

HON. CLARENCE C. DILL,
Chairman of Committee on Interstate Commerce,
United States Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: Our legal department has called my attention to a possible question which has arisen as to the power of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to make a loan to a trustee in bankruptcy for a railroad company appointed pursuant to section 77 of the amendment of March 3, 1933, to the national bankruptcy act.

Under this section provision is made for the court to appoint a receiver of the court, referred to therein as a "trustee", for a railroad company which has become subject to the act.

Under the provisions of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act of January 22, 1932, this Corporation is limited with respect to railroad loans to loans "to aid in the temporary financing of railroads and railways engaged in interstate commerce, to railroads and railways in process of construction, and to receivers of such railroads and railways." There is no language in the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act which would specifically permit a loan to be made to a "trustee" appointed under the national bankruptcy act as amended by the act of March 3, 1933.

If it is the intent of Congress that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation should make loans to a trustee for a railroad company, I think all doubt on the question should be removed, if possible, by an appropriate statutory amendment.

I enclose for your consideration a brief memorandum which discusses the relevant provisions of the two statutes above referred to, and also a short tentative draft of an amendment which might logically be inserted at the end of clause (3) of paragraph (c) of section 77 of the aforesaid act of March 3, 1933.

Yours very truly,

JESSE H. JONES, Acting Chairman.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I have another amendment which I drew with a view to offering it to this bill. It is the amendment which provides that before any more loans shall be made to a railroad the Interstate Commerce Commission shall determine the question of its financial structure being such as to allow the railroad to continue operating on its own earnings without coming to the Government for further loans. I have conferred with the Senator from Florida about the amendment; he feels that it would rather complicate the bill, and, in light of the fact that a similar provision is in the railroad bill which was introduced today, I think I will not offer the amendment but will ask that it may be printed as a part of my remarks in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The proposed amendment is as follows:

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. DILL to the bill (S. 1094) to provide for the purchase by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation of preferred stock and/or bonds and/or debentures of insurance companies, viz: At the proper place, insert the following:

"That an act entitled 'An act to provide emergency financing facilities for financial institutions, to aid in financing agriculture, commerce, and industry, and for other purposes', approved January 22, 1932, as amended by an act approved July 21, 1932, be further amended by adding at the beginning of section 5 thereof the letter (a) and by adding at the end of said section the following:

"(b) The Corporation shall make no loans to a railroad for the purpose of paying interest on funded debt, taxes, or wages to regular employees not employed on new construction, deferred maintenance, or new equipment, until the railroad corporation making application for loan—

"(1) has provided that for a period of at least 2 years no official, executive officer, or employee of the railroad shall receive a salary greater than $25,000 per year; and

"(2) until the Interstate Commerce Commission shall have fixed the amount of capital stock and bonded indebtedness of the railroad and the number of vice presidents and executive officers which in the opinion of the Commission will enable the railroad thereafter to provide for its own capital needs without additional loans for interest on funded debts, taxes, or wages to regular employees and also until the railroad has complied with such findings: Provided, That if the amount of stock and bonded indebtedness of the railroad fixed by the Commission is less than the amount outstanding, then the railroad may reduce its stocks and bonds to that amount either by agreement of its security holders or by proceedings under the provisions of section 77 of the Bankruptcy Act of March 3, 1933. Loans under this subsection shall be made for such period as the Commission may fix, but not to exceed 15 years, and shall constitute a preferred security of the railroad."

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, I am advised that in the State of Ohio, as well as in other States, very substantial funds have been accumulated to pay losses in connection with workmen's compensation acts. Such funds are in large part invested in municipal bonds, most of which will ultimately be good, but at the present moment, being somewhat under a cloud, they have rather a questionable market, and it is not always possible to make a ready sale of such securities. I am going to offer an amendment to permit the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to make loans to such State insurance funds, the loans, of course, to be secured by adequate collateral.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 4, after line 5, it is proposed to insert the following as a new section:

SEC. —. Section 5 of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, as amended, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is further authorized and empowered to make loans to any State insurance fund established or created by the laws of any State for the purpose of paying or insuring payment of compensation to injured workmen and those disabled as a result of disease contracted in the course of their employment, or to their dependents. As used in this paragraph, the term 'State' includes the several States and Alaska, Hawaii, and Puerto Rico."

Mr. BULKLEY. I hope the Senator from Florida will accept the amendment.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I think it is a very meritorious proposal, and, so far as I am concerned, I have no objection to it.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President—

Mr. BULKLEY. I yield to the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. HATFIELD. Should not the Senator add the word "injury"? The word "disease" is mentioned, but in most cases compensation is paid on account of injury.

Mr. BULKLEY. The amendment reads:

Compensation to injured workmen and those disabled as a result of disease.

Mr. HATFIELD. I did not catch those words when the amendment was read.

Mr. KING. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BULKLEY. I yield.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I did not catch the full meaning of the Senator's statement. The loans are to be made by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation under the proposed amendment to whom and for what purpose and upon what security?

Mr. BULKLEY. The loans will be made to State funds established for such purposes as I have outlined and on the security of whatever investments the State funds may have. Usually the security would be municipal bonds.

Mr. KING. Would the State be responsible for the obligation thus created or sought to be created?

Mr. BULKLEY. I think the fund itself would be responsible and that adequate security would be provided in each case.

Mr. KING. Is it not a fact that many of these funds are either exhausted or so impaired that it will be impossible to meet obligations against them?

Mr. BULKLEY. My amendment does not provide any exception to the rule under which the Reconstruction Finance Corporation always operates, namely, that its loans must be adequately secured. If any fund is so impaired that it cannot post adequate security or collateral, this amendment would not help it.

Mr. KING. The Senator knows that against some of these funds which have been obtained through contributions by corporations or in part by the employees obligations have been incurred and the funds are wholly inadequate to meet the obligations. The point I am making is, are we not putting the Government in the position of loaning money against a fund that does not exist; that is, nebulous and evanescent?

Mr. BULKLEY. The amendment which I have offered would not be subject, I think, to that criticism; it applies only to State insurance funds, and, as I have said, does not make any exception to the rule that adequate security must be given. The fund, for instance, in the State of Ohio is about $37,000,000, and no such amount as that would need to be borrowed, and perfectly adequate security can be given for any loan that may be made.

Mr. KING. As I understand the Senator, there has been a fund created and those in charge have loaned the fund and taken collateral; they have invested it in what they considered good securities.

Mr. BULKLEY. They have invested, as I have said, in perfectly good municipal securities, but now, with the defaulting of some interest, they find themselves short of cash, and also without a ready market for the securities.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I can only say that the Federal Government is now being made the catch-all for municipalities, States, private corporations, and industrial corporations. Where they cannot get credit, the Federal Government, under the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act and amendatory provisions, is to be made, in the language of the street, "the goat." That expression is not quite appropriate, but it is to be the instrumentality to carry all these organizations through the period of depression, many of which will never be able to pay to the Government the money which they are obtaining. I think we have gone too far. This is just as meritorious as, and, perhaps more meritorious than many of the suggestions which have been made and which have been incorporated into the law. Already demand is being made for all sorts of investments and loans. Three persons today have been to see me. They want loans to develop mining operations and business enterprises and to extend the activities of municipalities, when the municipalities are unable to meet their obligations. If we are not very careful, Mr. President, we will soon be at the brink of the precipice, so far as the credit of the United States is concerned.

Mr. BULKLEY. The Senator's argument, of course, goes to the whole principle of the Government advancing money at all. I am pleased to hear him admit that the suggestion which I have made is more meritorious than most other suggestions which have been already adopted.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. BULKLEY. I yield.

Mr. HEBERT. The State funds are operated under State laws providing for their establishment and maintenance?

Mr. BULKLEY. Undoubtedly.

Mr. HEBERT. Those who have charge of the funds are State appointees, are they not?

Mr. BULKLEY. Undoubtedly.

Mr. HEBERT. It seems to me there might be some obstacle in the way of incurring obligations on behalf of States by those who have charge of the funds.

Mr. BULKLEY. That is unquestionably true. If the State board having charge of the funds has no authority to borrow, then the loan cannot be made, but that is no reason why a loan should be denied to a board in another State which has legal authority to borrow.

Mr. HEBERT. Does the Senator know whether or not those having charge of the fund in the State of Ohio, for instance, have authority to borrow?

Mr. BULKLEY. I am informed it could be done immediately, and I have no doubt it can be done in other States. Any State could qualify so as to borrow under these terms.

Mr. HEBERT. The funds now in the hands of this activity are invested in municipal bonds, I understood the Senator to say?

Mr. BULKLEY. I so understand.

Mr. HEBERT. And there is no possible way of raising cash by putting up the bonds as collateral?

Mr. BULKLEY. The market for the bonds is bad, and sales are not considered desirable. Banks are in such a condition that they do not like to extend themselves, and it seems appropriate that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation be authorized to make the loan.

Mr. HEBERT. Under the law creating the fund in the State of Ohio, what occurs where the fund is deficient? Of course, the Senator is familiar with conditions there.

In other words, where there is not sufficient money to take care of its obligations, then what occurs under the law creating the fund? Does the State undertake by itself to provide funds?

Mr. BULKLEY. There is no question of deficiency of assets. If those in charge of the fund sell the municipal bonds, they will take an undue loss, but they can get the money to pay the obligations. No question of insolvency is involved.

Mr. HEBERT. The fund is amply able to take care of the situation?

Mr. BULKLEY. Oh, there is no question about that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee whether he believes the amendment on page 3 is sufficiently clear and mandatory to compel payment in cash into the treasury of the insurance companies seeking a loan before they may obtain the loan? The language is not very clear.

I am sure that is the intention. It is intended, of course, that they shall subscribe one half of the stock and pay in cash that subscription into the treasury of the corporation before there is any obligation upon the part of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to extend any credit. If the Senator is satisfied with that language, although I think it might be made more mandatory, I shall not complain.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I think the language is sufficient. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation must be satisfied that the borrowers are in a position to contribute their half before the Reconstruction Finance Corporation will subscribe the stock. I think it is clear enough and strong enough.

Mr. KING. I should have preferred an amendment providing that the cash shall be paid into the treasury of such applicant before any loan or purchase of stock shall have been consummated.

Mr. FLETCHER. I would rather not make it so drastic as that. It might be that many of the companies could not absolutely pay the cash at once, but they are in a position to do it before the loan is made.

Mr. KING. I hope the Senator does not mean to discredit in advance the solvency of these corporations, so that they will not be able to meet the subscription?

Mr. FLETCHER. No; they are not insolvent, but this is calling upon them to go out among their stockholders and solicit each one of them to contribute additional capital to the corporation so it can proceed. That is going to be rather a difficult task. I have had many letters from companies which would like to come under the provisions of the bill, but which say they cannot do it, because they cannot raise the money. They will be closed out for that very reason. But the committee felt it was fair and just and insisted upon the amendment. We have had more criticism of that provision than any other part of the bill, because it is going to be very difficult for some of the smaller insurance companies to raise additional capital now. It is a very difficult thing to do. Some of them will be closed on that account. I would not like to make it so drastic as to make it impossible for nearly all of them to take advantage of it.

Mr. KING. I want it so drastic that the loan will not be extended or the stock purchased by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and then have them find that the corporation is unable to put up its share of the new stock which it has subscribed. We know that there is "many a slip twixt cup and lip." Some insurance companies, doubtless animated by a desire to survive and obtain their share of the hundred million dollars, will make strong representations to obtain a loan and to induce the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to subscribe capital stock and pay for it, of course. No doubt, so animated, they will make many such representations and they will rely upon claims made or assurances given by individuals that they will subscribe, and after the Government has subscribed and paid its money and extended credit, some of those who have given the assurances will fail to respond, and we will not get the half of the total amount which was to be paid in by the stockholders of the applicant.

Mr. FLETCHER. But the bill provides that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation shall not subscribe for, purchase, or accept as collateral for loans under this bill preferred stock until they are satisfied. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation must first be satisfied.

Mr. KING. Then the Senator understands that the bill provides that no loans may be made unless stock shall be subscribed equal to the loans which are made?

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes; that is my understanding.

Mr. KING. That is to say, if loans are made, the stock must be subscribed by stockholders of equal amount to the loans made, or if preferred stock is purchased by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, then the stockholders of the applicant must subscribe an equal amount of the preferred stock?

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes.

Mr. COUZENS. Under a previous act an insurance company could borrow without having to put up any money for the purchase of common stock.

Mr. KING. But this is a better protection for the Government.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will state the next amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. The committee proposes, on page 4, line 10, to strike out the word "such" and insert the word "any", and in line 11, to strike out the word "persons", so as to make the section read:

SEC. 5. The right to alter or amend or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved. If any provision of this act, or the application thereof to any person, firm, association, or corporation, is held invalid, the remainder of the act, and the application of such provision to any other person, firm, association, or corporation, shall not be affected thereby.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. The Senator from Wisconsin proposes, at the proper place in the bill, to add a new section, as follows:

SEC. —. Section 5 of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, as amended, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is further authorized and empowered to make loans to any fund created by any State for the purpose of insuring the repayment of deposits of public moneys of such State or any of its political subdivisions in banks or depositories qualified under the law of such State to receive such deposits. Such loans may be made at any time prior to January 23, 1934, and upon such terms and conditions as the Corporation may prescribe; except that any fund which receives a loan under this paragraph shall be required to assign to the Corporation, to the expense of such loan, all amounts which may be received by such fund as dividends or otherwise from the liquidation of any such bank or depository in which deposits of such public moneys were made. As used in this paragraph, the term 'State' includes the several States and Alaska, Hawaii, and Puerto Rico."

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, the amendment which I have submitted was offered by former Senator Blaine in the last session of Congress as an amendment to the Wagner bill. The amendment was adopted and the bill passed the Senate, but, as Senators will remember, the measure was not acted upon by the House of Representatives.

In my own State as the depression deepened the surety companies, which normally issue bonds against public deposits, withdrew from that field. The State, having a provision in its constitution which prohibits it from going into debt and issuing bonds, proceeded in the only manner available to it to protect the deposits of public moneys on the part of municipalities, towns, villages, and school districts, by creating a public corporation which performed the functions carried on in normal times by the surety companies, and set up a charge of 2 percent to be paid into the fund against the daily balances carried in the public deposits.

The Reconstruction Finance Corporation holds that the existing law does not permit it to make loans of this character. Senators will see at once from the provisions of the amendment that it is merely permissive; that is, it grants the Corporation authority to make loans to funds of this character assuming that the corporation is satisfied that the provision for the payment of dividends received from the banks is adequate and properly amortized to repay the loan.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. COUZENS. How much is now in the Wisconsin fund? Is there some money in the fund?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I cannot give the Senator the exact information as to how much is in the fund at the present time, but money has been paid in continuously during the time this plan has been in operation. What is desired is to make a loan so that some of the public funds may be freed in order that the municipality or the town or the school district may have access to its funds pending liquidation of the banks.

Mr. COUZENS. In other words, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation security will be only the pledge of the banks to pay into this fund?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That coupled with the fact that of course the depository fund will be repaid as the banks are liquidated. In other words, they will receive dividends just like other depositors.

Mr. COUZENS. So there is no actual security to pay, except the pledges?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The actual security will be an assignment by the corporation of its proportion of whatever dividends the Reconstruction Finance Corporation determines to be necessary in order to protect it.

Mr. COUZENS. Does the Senator know of any other State that has a like arrangement?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I cannot answer the Senator's question, but I would like to say that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is today making or has been in the past making loans to private surety companies which have performed this function. It seems to me it would be only equitable, where a large public corporation has been organized for this purpose, that it should have the same access to the facilities of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation that a private surety corporation organized for profit may have.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. On that feature, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act uses the words "adequate security." I do not remember that the Senator's amendment had that language in it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It amends section 5 to the extent of permitting the Corporation to make loans to funds of this character; but, of course, it is not in any sense mandatory upon the Corporation to make such a loan if, in its judgment, the assignments of these future dividends are not sufficient, in the judgment of the Corporation, to protect them.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, would the Senator object to having those banks which are in the future to pay dividends put up some of their assets as security for these loans? I am afraid this amendment is opening the door wide to accepting simple pledges which may or may not be paid, depending upon the methods of liquidation of the conservators or the receivers. The Government cannot control the actions of the receivers or the conservators, and in the meantime it has no security.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me—

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. It seems to me this amendment does not belong on this bill.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It is a little late for the Senator to raise that objection against amendments; and may I say that this amendment was debated previously and agreed to by the Senate. The same objection that the Senator now raises to this amendment might be raised to other amendments which have already been offered, and which he has accepted.

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not think that is the case at all. This is a proposition for the Federal Government to loan to some State corporation, as I understand. The Senator refers to it as a public corporation. I presume it is a corporation in which the State owns the stock. Is that the idea?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes.

Mr. FLETCHER. The State owns the stock of a corporation, and that corporation needs some money to liquidate some claims that are made against it, and it wants to come here to borrow that money. I do not see why the State cannot wait until these contributions or assessments come in, and go on with the matter in the regular way. I do not see why the Federal Government should undertake to loan money to such a corporation which is in need of money and which has no assets except some kind of pledge or other from banks, or something of the sort. I do not know just the nature of it. It seems to me a mysterious sort of arrangement.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It is on a perfectly sound basis.

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not see what security the Government is going to get.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin yield to me?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. COUZENS. Has the Senator a copy of the amendment in his hand?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes.

Mr. COUZENS. If the Senator will read on line 5, I wonder if it would be satisfactory to the Senator to have it read as follows:

The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is further authorized and empowered to make loans, if adequately secured, to any fund—

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will modify my amendment as suggested by the Senator from Michigan; and may I say, in response to the suggestion of the Senator from Florida, that I certainly have not made myself clear if I have left him under the impression that there is anything mysterious or nebulous about the function which this corporation has performed. It was organized to take up the functions of the private security companies, which withdrew from the field, and it was the only means available whereby the State could discharge its responsibility of affording to public funds deposited by municipalities, townships, and school districts a protection to which all such funds are entitled if there is to be any protection at all to that type of deposits.

There is nothing shocking about this suggestion. The mere fact that this corporation was organized by the State is no reason why it should not be given the same opportunity to secure loans from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation as private corporations engaged in the same business.

Mr. FLETCHER. I can conceive of a State desiring to protect the funds of its school districts, and so forth; but it has the same means of protection that the Federal Government has for protecting its funds. It can require the deposit of its bonds to protect the deposits. To take the obligations of some corporation to insure the deposit of public funds, however, is another matter.

Mr. COUZENS. I think this applies to past acts, and is not comparable to making new deposits. That is the reason why I am in favor of the amendment.

Mr. FLETCHER. I shall not make any objection to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin, as modified.

The amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the clerk will be authorized to renumber the sections.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I move to strike out the figures "$100,000,000" and to insert in lieu thereof "$50,000,000". I should like to strike out the whole appropriation.

Mr. WALSH. Will the Senator explain his amendment?

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator will realize that this is not an act of appropriation at all.

Mr. KING. It is an authorization.

Mr. FLETCHER. It enables the borrowing power of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to be increased to this extent, but that does not mean that this $100,000,000 shall be appropriated at all. It does not mean that they are going to use it. It does not mean that they will have any occasion to use it, really; but it is put in here so as to protect the Corporation, and so as to limit the extent to which they may enlarge or expand their borrowing power. It is a limitation on the borrowing power of the Corporation to this extent for this purpose. It is not an appropriation at all. They may never use it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I think it is practically appropriated. I read from the bill:

The amount of notes, bonds, debentures, and other such obligations which the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized and empowered to issue and to have outstanding at any one time under existing law is hereby increased by $100,000,000, in order to provide funds to carry out the provisions of this act.

So I think it is provided for.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I agree in part with what my dear friend from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] has said. It is a limitation, but a limitation obviously for the purpose of enabling the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to go to the limit; namely, $100,000,000. My proposition is to fix the limitation at $50,000,000 instead of $100,000,000.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I am wondering if the Senator from Utah himself knows, or if the Senator from Florida knows, or if anybody can answer the question as to how much is needed. What is the emergency? Just how much money do these companies need?

Mr. FLETCHER. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation told us that they would like to have that amount of leeway to provide the necessary funds. No one knows exactly what the demands may be.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Utah permit the Chair to call attention to the fact that the amendment proposed by him is to an amendment which has already been agreed to.

Mr. FLETCHER. I was going to make that point.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In order to consider the Senator's amendment, there must be a reconsideration of the committee amendment that has been agreed to.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, in the haste with which we are putting these measures through, sometimes when we are called from the Chamber to attend committee meetings an amendment is adopted, but there never is any objection to reconsideration. I ask unanimous consent that the vote by which the $100,000,000 was inserted be reconsidered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none; and the motion to reconsider is agreed to.

Mr. KING. Now I renew the offer of my amendment, if it is necessary.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. COUZENS. I do not desire to interfere with the chairman of the committee; but I was present when the testimony was given by the directors of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and personally I can see no objection to making the amount $50,000,000. If they expend it, they can come back here and ask for more; but, frankly, I do not think they are going to make any purchases at all of preferred stock under the act because of the difficulty of raising money for common-stock purchases.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on agreeing to the committee amendment as amended.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the chairman of the committee whether or not the committee considered the proposition of lowering or striking out entirely the provision which compels the companies to match any money subscribed for stock in the case of insurance companies?

Mr. FLETCHER. We have just been thrashing out that matter here for nearly an hour.

Mr. TYDINGS. I mean in the committee itself?

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes.

Mr. TYDINGS. The committee is unanimously opposed to doing that?

Mr. FLETCHER. The committee is in favor of what has been reported here.

Mr. TYDINGS. The reason why I asked the Senator the question is that I have been asked to offer an amendment to that effect, and I did not want to have it appear that I was reluctant to do so; but in view of the fact that the committee seems to be unanimously opposed to any such amendment I see no use in offering the amendment, because evidently it would be defeated.

Mr. FLETCHER. I will say to the Senator that the Senator from Utah proposed an even more drastic amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment, as amended.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I do not desire to delay the Senate, and shall not do so except for a very few minutes to express my opposition to the policy involved in the bill.

I think the measure has been very greatly improved by a number of the amendments which have been added, particularly the last one, as a result of which the gross amount has been reduced to $50,000,000. Therefore, what remains for discussion is the question of policy, especially at the present time.

I assume that the bill will pass. Most of those on the floor will vote for it. I shall vote against it because I believe there is no emergency that requires its passage. In these days of depression, when everybody groans under tax burdens, and when we are making stupendous efforts to balance the Budget, it seems to me a foolhardy thing to arrange to loan even $50,000,000 to the insurance companies of the country, which, in my judgment, in the great majority of cases are in whatever financial straits that may surround them largely because of their own mismanagement.

In the midst of this depression, Mr. President, the insurance companies of the country, after having ground down their employees to reduced wages and reduced salaries and reduced commissions, have at the same time, without permitting their policyholders to know anything about it, increased the salaries of their executive officers to enormous heights—heights never even heard of during the best days of so-called "prosperity." That was inexcusable, of course. That casts suspicion on their efforts now to borrow money from the Treasury of the United States or from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

Mr. President, I have a letter from William F. Streich, a life-insurance consultant of Philadelphia. I cannot vouch for the truth of all that is contained in this letter. I assume, however, that he states the facts. If what he says is true, the pending bill should be defeated; in any event, so far as it may apply to life-insurance companies, and we have found from other evidence submitted to the Senate that conditions are equally bad with the fire-insurance companies.

I shall read from this communication only a small part of all that it contains:

Before getting to the main subject I will dispose of the question you raised relative to Reconstruction Finance Corporation advances to insurance companies claimed to be absolutely necessary for protection of the policyholders. In my opinion the appropriation of $100,000,000 for this purpose, as proposed in the Fletcher bill, is like dropping 10 drops into a leaking 10-gallon bucket of water, and would serve no other purpose than furnish additional working capital for the sole purpose of defraying acquisition costs of new business. These loans to life-insurance companies have no relation to the existing emergency. No solvent insurance company is in need of funds for capital purposes unless construed to mean need for working capital. Insolvent companies should be treated in the same manner as are banks not up to the standard of solvency, irrespective of whether such companies furnish an amount of capital equal to that for which application is made to the Corporation, or whether the compensation to any officer, director, or employee of the applicant be $17,500 per annum or even less. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation advances that have been made to insurance companies have not had the effect they were intended to have, as evidenced by the two outstanding cases—the indemnity concern which recently went to the wall in New Orleans immediately after an advance of over $1,000,000, and the Illinois Life of Chicago immediately after having received, as I remember, $1,500,000, not to mention numerous other cases on the verge of being thrown into receivers' hands.

It was as late as March 10 last that it was declared at the annual congress of the Life Underwriters Association of the City of New York that, "despite the depression the current income of life-insurance companies was 50 percent more than is needed to pay all death claims, maturing endowments, and annuities, together with payment of loans on policies or surrender for their cash value." Why should these companies, therefore, ask for loans except it be for the purpose above stated—working capital for the sole purpose of defraying acquisition costs of new business. If not this, the only construction to be placed upon their requests for loans from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is their desire for capital for manipulation and to cover reckless extravagances which have become habitual with these institutions, all to the detriment of the policyholders.

Now to get to the point. In one of his messages to the Fifty-ninth Congress, President Theodore Roosevelt accurately stated facts when he said this: "The great insurance companies afford striking examples of corruption. . . . It has been too clearly shown that certain men at the head of these large corporations take too little note of the ethical distinction between honesty and dishonesty, they draw the line this side of what may be called law honesty, the kind of honesty necessary in order to avoid falling into the clutches of the law."

That description given by President Roosevelt of the culprits of those days exactly fits the manipulators of the more than $20,000,000,000 today belonging to over 60,000,000 beguiled policyholders. In some respects life-insurance conditions are worse now than they were prior to the New York legislative investigation in 1905-6.

In their usurpation of bank and trust functions, and by exercising the privilege granted them by State insurance superintendents, in obedience to orders given them by the companies themselves, these concerns, just now when thousands of policyholders are in dire need of funds, are holding up cash-surrender values and are denying policy loans against the cash and loan values set forth in the policy contracts. And this they are doing in the face of paying salaries to company executives three times and more than the salary paid to the President of the United States. Moreover, the stock companies are paying dividends ranging from 15 percent to 25 percent, plus stock dividends, to their stockholders. Not only this, but salaries to executives of mutual companies have been increased despite decrease in dividends to policyholders in these same companies, in some instances as much as 50 percent.

In other words, right at the time when they were increasing all these salaries they were discontinuing the payment of dividends to their stockholders.

Besides the extravagances just mentioned, ocean-going steamers are chartered for excursion conventions, at which agents are instructed how to lure the public into giving up in excess of twice the premiums required to cover the insurance risk assumed by the companies.

I promised the Senate I would not detain Members for any considerable length of time, and therefore I skip large portions of this letter and will try to pick out some of the salient paragraphs:

Adequate reserves are a prerequisite to all forms of life insurance, but cash values created by excessive premiums are not.

So-called "cash values" virtually are deposits unwittingly made by the insured with the companies. They are available only as policy loans or upon surrender of the policies.

I pointed out a moment ago that while they were raising their own salaries to enormous heights they discontinued making payments to their policyholders, even though they were impairing the obligations of contracts in doing so.

When loans are taken the insurance is reduced by the amount of the loan. When policies are surrendered for the "cash value" the insurance is automatically canceled. If a loan has not been taken, the cash values are applied by companies as part of the face amount of policies when the policies become payable under death claims. Hence, again, the principle held by life-insurance actuaries that cash values are self-insurance.

Finally, Mr. President, is this exceedingly pertinent paragraph, which I bring to the attention of the Senate:

This condition calls for a Federal investigation like that by the New York legislative committee in 1905-6 previously mentioned, because methods no less reprehensible than those brought to public attention during that investigation are again in evidence.

Mr. President, I shall read no more from the letter at this time.

I would like to suggest, in conclusion, that I dislike the policy of purchasing securities from these insurance companies for a number of reasons. The Federal Government has utterly no control over insurance companies. The Supreme Court of the United States has held that insurance is not commerce. Therefore each State is the arbiter of the question. Each State decides what companies may be permitted to sell insurance within its domain. Generally speaking, an insurance commissioner of a State handles that work. We have no authority for regulating insurance companies. They are purely State institutions, but they now come to the Congress and to the Federal Government and ask for a hundred million dollars in loans.

If they are in a bad way today, Mr. President, I have no doubt that in the great majority of instances their difficulties are due to their own mismanagement. Therefore, as a matter of policy, and because I do not think it is needed at this time, I shall vote against the bill and shall not attempt to delay final consideration or a final vote.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill, as amended.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading and to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

PRESERVATION OF VALUABLE HISTORIC DOCUMENTS

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, the able and efficient Secretary of the Senate has brought to my attention a number of old public documents, some of which are of great value. These documents are now in the files of the Secretary of the Senate. They include the numerous messages of the first President to the Congress, which are the originals, bearing the signature of George Washington himself.

Mr. President, among these messages is Washington's first inaugural address, a document of very great value. It is in bad condition and needs to be cared for very promptly.

There are also the certificates of the electoral votes of the Thirteen Original States for the first election of a President and Vice President.

The conference report and several drafts of the first 12 amendments submitted, constituting the Bill of Rights.

A message from the National Assembly of France in regard to the assembly wearing mourning for 3 days as a mark of respect to Benjamin Franklin.

A report of the Secretary of War on the Military Establishment, dated 1789.

A full report of Charles Thomson, appointed by Congress to notify General Washington of his election as President, a description of his visit to Mount Vernon, his speech to General Washington, the latter's reply, and a statement respecting their journey northward to New York.

Various amendments and conference reports dealing with the bill providing for a permanent seat of government in Washington.

Mr. President, these are only a few of the documents on file. There are many others, such as the original messages from the earlier Presidents—Washington, Adams, Jefferson, and others—in their own handwriting, and most of the messages bearing the signatures of their authors.

There is also a letter from Louis XVI of France.

Mr. President, among these very important and interesting papers is a letter from General Washington to Baron von Steuben, dated at Annapolis, December 23, 1783, and the letter concludes with this paragraph:

This is the last letter I shall ever write while I continue in the service of my country. The hour of my resignation is fixed at 12 this day, after which I shall become a private citizen on the banks of the Potomack, where I shall be glad to embrace you, and to testify the great esteem and consideration with which

I am, my dear Baron

Your most obedient and affectionate servant,

G. WASHINGTON.

In order that proper care may be taken of these very valuable documents, I submit a resolution and ask its reference to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. It will be necessary to expend a small sum from the contingent fund of the Senate. The amount has been left blank in the resolution, with the expectation that the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate will insert such sum as it finds necessary.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be received and referred as indicated.

The resolution (S.Res. 73) was read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate is authorized to expend from the contingent fund of the Senate such sums as may be necessary, not to exceed $——, for the purpose of adequately providing for the preservation of old documents on file in the Senate Library.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, on behalf of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY], I suggest that that nomination go over at least until Monday.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. What was the suggestion?

Mr. FESS. That the nomination of Comptroller of the Currency go over until Monday.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Very well.

JED C. ADAMS—NOTIFICATION TO PRESIDENT

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, on yesterday the nomination of Jed C. Adams to be a member of the Board of Tax Appeals was confirmed. It had not been my purpose to ask unanimous consent that the President be notified, but, in view of the fact that the Senate will probably adjourn or take a recess until next Monday, I should like to ask unanimous consent that the President be notified.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY] is not present and there was an understanding that such request would not be made.

Mr. CONNALLY. I withdraw the request.

Mr. COSTIGAN. At the request of the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER], who is necessarily absent on official business, I ask unanimous consent that the President be notified of the confirmation of the nominations of Mr. Robbins and Mr. Steinhardt. I do not know whether or not the request conflicts with the desire of the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, we have heretofore had difficulties by reason of having notified the President before the rule has been complied with, and I think it ought to be observed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. COUZENS. I will have to object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

The Senate resumed legislative session.

ADDRESS BY SECRETARY HULL BEFORE INTERNATIONAL CHAMBER OF COMMERCE

Mr. HAYDEN. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and referred to the Committee on Finance an address by the Secretary of State, Hon. Cordell Hull, delivered before the American section of the International Chamber of Commerce on May 2.

There being no objection, the address was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADDRESS OF THE HONORABLE CORDELL HULL, SECRETARY OF STATE, AT DINNER OF THE AMERICAN SECTION OF THE INTERNATIONAL CHAMBER OF COMMERCE, HOTEL MAYFLOWER, WASHINGTON, D.C., MAY 2, 1933, 9:30 P.M.

Mr. Toastmaster, members of the International Chamber of Commerce, ladies, and gentlemen, it is a high compliment to be invited to address this assemblage of outstanding business men, and I am correspondingly grateful for your invitation. I am greatly pleased to be able to bear testimony to the fine record in many respects that the International Chamber of Commerce, under the leadership of the American section, has made since its meeting in Rome soon after the war, in support of the fundamentals of sound post-war economic policies. Your responsibilities to the general public were never greater than today. The leadership and statesmanship of no other generation were ever subjected to a more serious challenge than is ours by the existing domestic and world difficulties. They will successfully meet that challenge, in my judgment, according to their disposition to recognize the fact that new conditions, new forces, and new ideas have come into our national life since the World War which cannot longer be ignored without serious risk of further business disaster. And, too, all must recognize that we are really living in a new age, which calls for more modernized and modified economic policies. Humanity simply cannot continue indefinitely to endure existing chaotic depression conditions. Civilization itself will ultimately be seriously undermined.

There should by this time be such important points of general agreement as the following:

All nations for many years prior to 1929 pursued the same fatal policy of extreme economic nationalism. Every nation alike was engulfed by the awful panic conditions which began in 1929. Each nation, during the past 3½ years, has been struggling single-handed to restore satisfactory domestic prosperity without regard to the prostrate business conditions in the balance of the world, but thus far without results at all satisfactory. The policy of economic isolation thus universally pursued since 1920 as an infallible guaranty of prosperity, was helpless either to prevent the most destructive business depression on record or to halt or cure it after it came. World conditions, contrary to isolationist predictions, did crash into the internal situation of each country and upset and paralyze its domestic economy.

It is now clear that no nation can live and thrive by itself. The proponents of the policy of economic isolation are now silent as to this world effect, but are still unable to offer any basic remedy for business recovery except this broken down and discredited policy. They can only point to its colossal failure as a guaranty of its future ability to improve business conditions. And yet these blind forces of short-sighted isolation here and elsewhere continue to criticize and to ask a world which has become impoverished and bankrupt under their leadership to continue to heed them and their ruinous policies. The tragedy is that supine and credulous people in numerous countries today still allow them to conduct their governments under this policy of extremism, while all continue to slide further toward insolvency and economic ruin. The limitations of human suffering cannot much longer tolerate this suicidal leadership in any country.

It is high time for an awakening and a disillusionment on the part of those accustomed blindly to cling to preconceived notions or ideas.

Each nation by itself can to a moderate extent restore business conditions by the adoption of a sound and comprehensive fiscal, financial, and general economic program. I am strongly of opinion that the present national administration from the outset has endeavored thus to conceive and as rapidly as possible carry into effect such a broad domestic program for business recovery. I feel, too, that it is entitled to, as it will doubtless receive at every stage, the whole-hearted cooperation of you and other financial and business leaders throughout the Nation. Such united effort will assure improvement in business conditions here at home, including a restoration of confidence, and this in turn will react most favorably upon the broader movement for world recovery.

Every nation must supplement its domestic program with a basic international economic program of remedies for business recovery. These would embrace the reduction of trade barriers, the stabilization of exchanges and currencies, and monetary standardization, all of which would permit a healthy increase of prices of primary commodities bought and sold in world markets.

I need not here detail and describe the universal effects of the present depression. President Hoover accurately stated these world conditions when in August 1932 he summed them up as to America as follows:

"The past 3 years have been a time of unparalleled economic calamity. They have been years of greater suffering and hardship than any which have come to the American people since the aftermath of the Civil War."

The people of all nations must now realize that they are fundamentally worse off, in every material sense at least, than they were 12 years ago, and that, therefore, nothing is more obvious than the necessity to demand new policies and new leadership. These unthinkable results constitute the most damaging and damning indictment that was ever brought against a single economic policy. The United States was the workshop of the world during the war, and should have maintained that relative position since that time. In 1920 it had the foundations soundly laid for the greatest commercial and financial expansion of all time. The Venetian, the Dutch, and the English, with their vast commercial power, would have suffered by comparison with the wonderful expansion within the grasp of America. As these trading countries, to their great enrichment, gathered and brought to their shores the wealth and civilization of every race and clime, so did the wealth of the world lie at the feet of America. But it was not to be ours.

The obsolete pre-war economic theory that prevailed here and elsewhere, ignored our transformation from a debtor and young undeveloped country to the greatest creditor and surplus-producing nation in history. It ignores the fact that today our public and private foreign indebtedness of $28,000,000,000, with annual payments of interest and installments aggregating $1,250,000,000, is due this country, and that nations and individuals can only pay external indebtedness in gold or services or by the establishment of favorable trade balances, whether with the creditor country or with other countries with whom trade is more profitable.

This suicidal theory further is to continue to build our tariff and commercial policy around the sole idea of safeguarding the home market, with no serious thought or concern about our vast surplus-producing capacity of twenty to thirty billion dollars and several millions of unemployed wage earners. It is likewise indifferent to the emigration of 2,000 plants to foreign countries, involving billions of American dollars, and throwing still additional American wage earners out of employment. The theory finally is to separate the home market from the world market, avoiding all semblance of competition, and to create a monopoly in the home market, under which arbitrary prices are artificially fixed which bear no relation to those of other countries. Every other nation is expected to pursue a like policy. The opposing view, while disclaiming extreme economic internationalism, on the other hand, would challenge extreme economic nationalism and launch this country upon a sane, practical middle course. It would supplement our impregnable home market with adequate foreign markets for our ever-increasing surpluses.

The opposing view, following 1920, also contemplated moderate tariffs and liberal commercial policy, calculated to secure not only foreign trade but the fullest measure of employment at high wages, increased production at lower cost, and suitable profits to capital. It taught that the only way to provide full employment of labor and capital at home is to sell our surplus, and that the Nation was equipped with every superior facility for great commercial expansion.

If, as has been the universal practice since the war, each country strenuously endeavors to produce as nearly as possible all that it consumes, regardless of costs, and so offers every sort of artificial stimulus, and at the same time restricts all trade with other nations to the very minimum, the equilibrium between production and consumption would soon be destroyed and the processes of exchange and distribution would break down. This is precisely what occurred in 1928-29, and the collapse would have come years earlier save for our huge foreign loans and other temporary saving agencies. It was inevitable that governments would thus be pauperized, wage scales wrecked, prices dislocated, currencies depreciated, and agriculture and labor impoverished.

The innocent myth that high tariff and other obstructions to finance and trade between nations insures full employment of labor and high wages, with high living standards, is utterly destroyed when we recall that the three countries with the most extreme trade barriers—America, Germany, and Italy—have around 20,000,000 unemployed wage earners. American wage earners have suffered losses of pay below the level of 1929 aggregating near $45,000,000,000. When will they become disillusioned as to isolation and discover that the restoration of a normal and steadily increasing international finance and trade is the key to sound and stable domestic prosperity here and everywhere?

The restoration of these international trade activities is patently wise in the light of even a few of the governing facts. The trade of the world, according to the pre-war rate of gain, would have been $52,000,000,000 for 1932, compared with the actual and shamefully nominal amount of $16,500,000,000. Suppose that all nations today were profitably exchanging surpluses with each other to the extent of this huge loss of $35,500,000,000—who is simple or brazen enough to deny that the world almost immediately would be blessed with a full measure of sound-business prosperity? America's share of these trade losses approaches $6,000,000,000, and who can well overestimate the effects of this amount of exports of our immense surpluses of foodstuffs, raw materials, and manufactures?

The fact that our Nation only exports an average of 8 to 10 percent of its annual surplus production has been deliberately used overtime by the extreme economic isolationist to mislead and deceive millions of credulous American citizens. No one knows better than each member of your organization that this is an utterly false implication and that, on the contrary, from 20 to 50 percent of the production of great staple industries, such as cotton, tobacco, wheat, hog products, copper, oil, coal, automobiles, machinery, tools, and a long list of others must be exported and sold abroad unless stagnation and price slumps are to result at home from the dammed-up surpluses, which in turn have the effect most seriously to undermine the entire economic structure of the Nation. Our national prosperity is directly dependent upon that of these great surplus-producing and exporting industries.

The public must learn that trade between nations does not mean the displacement, more or less, of established home production and trade of one country by that of another. International trade is chiefly barter, or a mutually profitable exchange of surpluses by different countries, either directly or in a triangular manner. It specially contemplates, too, that an enterprising nation goes out into the world and locates and develops new markets for its surpluses. Resolute action is required to accomplish this purpose. The public must realize that, in addition to exchange between countries of commodities the purchaser does not produce, there is a large range of necessary or desirable commodities, the production of which is not economically justifiable, or which are produced in wholly minor quantities compared with home demands. There are many assortments and kinds of novelties, specialties, patterns, and other articles not competitive either materially or at all with home production, which Americans widely seek. There can profitably be a further exchange of commodities under the doctrine that this and other countries cannot justify the prevailing policy of artificial protection for any individual business that is patently inefficient on account of antiquated plant, inflated capital structure, or incompetent management. All efficient industries would thereby be placed upon a much healthier and more prosperous basis. The gradual and careful readjustment of the excesses in tariff and other trade barriers to a reasonable and moderate level would not contemplate either unreasonable or excessive competitive imports against an efficient domestic industry operated under normal conditions on the one hand nor monopolistic price advantages at home on the other.

The very small percentage of imports that might thus become possible would enable other countries in return to purchase our more burdensome surpluses, such as automobiles, textiles, machinery, agricultural products, minerals, and a large range of others. Trade among nations is really a mutually profitable affair. This policy, as the opposition often unfairly charges, does not contemplate no tariffs, nor even low tariffs, but a reasonable, moderate, decent level of tariffs, in lieu of existing rank and wild excesses and discriminations. The Buffalo speech of William McKinley even visualized such moderate level.

The far-reaching effect of international trade is further understood when we recall that most South American countries must export and sell abroad from 30 to 50 percent of their total production; England must sell 25 percent; Germany, 30 percent; Canada, 30 to 35 percent; Australia, 30 percent; New Zealand, 40 percent; and Japan, 45 to 60 percent. America must look mainly to those countries to purchase her surplus foodstuffs, raw materials, and finished manufactures. A slump on the international market, from any cause, with a serious drop of export prices and values, can cause a breakdown of the entire economic and financial life of these large exporting countries, and this in turn paralyzes our own foreign trade, and, as has been demonstrated during this panic, cuts in half our production and trade among ourselves here at home and throws millions of wage earners out of employment.

Probably 75 to 80 percent of the 2,000,000,000 population of the world are living below the poverty line. This means a lack either of adequate food or clothing, or both. This was the actual state of living standards even when the panic broke in 1929.

Shall the greatest financial, industrial, and surplus-producing Nation shrink and renounce the opportunities and responsibilities of economic leadership, leaving the living standards of most of the world population virtually on a level with the ground, withdrawing from most all world business relations and pursuing the permanent policy of living within and unto itself? Who will be the first leader to make the ignoble confession that American leadership is incapable of carrying our living standards and industrial and other phases of civilization to any higher summit? What second- or third-rate country would step to the front and take the place of America? Worst of all, what would soon happen to our 124,000,000 population thus retiring to seclusion from the world? The Nation soon would become decadent.

The view is eternally sound that our home market must be supplemented by a growing foreign trade for the purpose of stable and desirable domestic prosperity. If high wages were a mere matter of legislative enactment, as the opposition asserts every country generations ago would have enacted high wages and high living standards. When each country uses every means to block each other's exports, peoples can neither sell nor buy each other's surpluses, with the result that both trade and purchasing power are dried up. I fear the policy of extreme isolation as the greatest danger to world peace and as more seriously threatening the world with bankruptcy than war itself.

NATHANIEL MACON—ARTICLE BY WILLIS G. BRIGGS

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article by Willis G. Briggs and published in the National Republic on the life of Nathaniel Macon, the first Member of Congress from North Carolina.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"CINCINNATUS OF AMERICA"—THIS TITLE WAS GIVEN TO THE DISTINGUISHED SOUTHERN STATESMAN, NATHANIEL MACON, BY THOMAS H. BENTON—TERMED "LAST OF THE ROMANS" BY PRESIDENT JEFFERSON

By Willis G. Briggs in the National Republic

Many extraordinary things, particularly in contrast with the modes of today, might be related of Nathaniel Macon (1758-1837). "The last of the Romans", Thomas Jefferson called him. "With the single exception of General Washington there is not one of your times who will stand so fair with posterity as yourself", wrote John Randolph in 1828. "Mr. Macon was the real Cincinnatus of America", says Thomas H. Benton in his Thirty Years' View. "No man in American history left a better name than Macon", is the verdict of the historian Henry Adams.

Macon's service in Congress covered 37 continuous years: 24 years in the House (Speaker three terms) and 13 in the Senate, voluntarily retiring in 1828. He was the recipient of the sister State Virginia's 24 electoral votes for Vice President in 1825 and twice declined a seat in the Cabinet. Yet throughout this long career he never sought public office, never solicited a vote, never made a political speech on the hustings, never asked the appointment to office of anyone at the hand of the Executive, but on the other hand always maintained his independence, claimed that he was a member of no political party, refused to attend the then customary congressional caucuses, and consistently declared that it was a matter of indifference to him who filled the appointive offices so long as the holders were honest and competent. "Independent, unambitious, free from intrigue, true to his convictions, kindly, and honorable," Henry Adams describes him. "A man of independent views and upright character, of frugal tendencies in public and private so constantly reelected as in later years to be called the 'Father of the House'", says the historian Schouler. His frugality, even parsimony, in matters of governmental expenditures, were his preeminent characteristics. "Let it ever be remembered that the public money in all countries is drawn from the sweat of the people", Macon constantly reminded his colleagues.

The annals of Macon's youth can be briefly told. About 1730 Gideon Macon left "the exhausted lands" of Virginia and acquired several hundred acres on Shocco Creek, a tributary of the Roanoke, in what was then a part of Granville but is now Warren County, N.C. In Gideon's home, surrounded by primeval oaks, the first house in all that section with the luxury of glass in the windows, behind the solid shutters, on December 17, 1758, the sixth child was born and named Nathaniel. When only 5 he was orphaned by the death of his father. By him the boy was devised about 600 acres of land and 3 Negroes. His mother did not neglect Nathaniel's education. When 15 he became a student at Princeton, in New Jersey. While there he served several months in the militia, but when, on account of the war with England, Princeton closed, Macon returned to his home on Shocco Creek and spent 2 years reading law and studying English history.

In most sections of North Carolina the Revolutionary struggle, on account of numerous loyalists and Tories, assumed the proportions of civil war. Lord Cornwallis overran South Carolina preparatory to invasion of North Carolina. With this threatened disaster at hand, Macon enlisted as a private. He refused the proffered bounty, rejected a commission as lieutenant, and would neither then nor subsequently accept compensation in any form for his military services, which he considered merely the performance of his duty. Following the Battle of Camden, he was in camp with Sumner's army on the banks of the Yadkin when, without his knowledge, the people of Warren County elected him to the State senate, called to convene January 1781.

Macon determined to ignore the summons and continue a private in the ranks, but General Green, then in command, hearing of the circumstances, called young Macon to his tent and with some difficulty finally persuaded him that the path of his duty led from the army to the halls of legislation. Beginning his long public career at the age of 23 as a member of the State senate in 1781, the policy of his youth was characteristic of his later years. His first concern was inspection and rigid examination of all public accounts. There must be no waste of the people's money. Moreover, the currency must be maintained on a sound metallic basis. Shifting sands of inflation were no basis for stable prosperity.

In 1783 Macon married Hannah Plummer, of Warren County, and there upon his 600-acre farm, called "Buck Springs", on Hub-quarter Creek, 12 miles north of Warrenton, N.C., and sufficiently isolated so that the owner "could not hear his nearest neighbor's dogs bark", he built, partly with his own hands, the dwelling which remained his home throughout his long and distinguished career. That house is still standing, doubtless the most unique house in America. It was the "big house" of the plantation, yet it is just 16 feet square, ample fireplace, entrance by 2 doors opposite each other, and 2 windows set nearly 6 feet from the floor, with a wine cellar underneath the house. Fifty feet from the "big house" was another exactly like it except larger chimney and fireplace with crane for pots and kettles, the lower room being used by the family as sitting room and kitchen, while later his two daughters occupied the upper room. The farm road led between the two houses and on one side a short distance away stood quarters, neat and well built, for the Negro slaves, and on the opposite side the barns, stables, and outhouses. The only money crop of the plantation was tobacco, of which from 2 to 3 hogsheads a year were produced. Of course, there was a blacksmith shop, a weaving room, and other equipment which helped to make the little farm a world unto itself. Here all lived together pretty much as one family. When home from Congress Macon worked with his Negroes in the field, topped his tobacco, and helped feed his stock, in which he always took keen pride and kept in best condition.

While not a member of any religious denomination, Macon always said that he was of the "Baptist persuasion", studied the Bible assiduously all his life, and on preaching days, then held on Saturday, he always worshipped in a Baptist meeting house attended by his Negroes. To his young disciple, Bartlett Yancey, in 1821 Macon wrote: "The whole Bible contains great knowledge on the principles of government. The rising generations forget the principles and maxims of their fathers, hence the destruction of free government in every age."

Each Sabbath morning when the master of Buck Springs was home all people on the plantation, white and black, dressed in their best clothes, were required to assemble at the "big house" for worship. Macon read and explained some chapter in the Bible and the Negroes had their part, praying and singing. On the subject of slavery Macon, unlike his friends Jefferson and Randolph, considered it the logical and desirable status of the races (Congress in 1807 enacted statute to make effective the prohibition of importation of Negroes for slaves. Bidwell of Massachusetts moved to amend the forfeiture clause "that no person be sold as a slave by virtue of this act." This amendment was defeated by Speaker Macon breaking the tie vote of the House). Macon did not believe in emancipation or colonization, but did hold and practice a patriarchal relation, bound by ties of affection. Even when his land holdings had perhaps trebled he never owned more than 75 slaves and the welfare of each was his personal concern. Speaking of this intimate attachment he once related a circumstance of one of his friends, sending a slave across the Atlantic to transact a business matter for the master in London. Slavery on the great plantations of the further South and Southwest, under overseers, probably presented a very different condition. The mistress of Buck Springs was described as a woman of rare charm, but she died in January 1790 before her husband began his congressional career and is buried at their home. Although Macon was only 34 years old when widowed he remained so wholly devoted to the memory of his Hannah that he never married again. His only son died in infancy.

When North Carolina finally ratified the Constitution of the United States, November 21, 1789, Nathaniel Macon, without solicitation on his part, was elected the first Representative in Congress from his district and took his seat October 26, 1791. His services during the administrations of Washington and Adams were marked by closest attention to public business and punctilious attendance upon every session. Indeed he was soon recognized as the best parliamentarian in the House.

In 1796, instead of increased salaries for public officials, Macon advocated reduction of salaries. Public servants should keep within their incomes and set a salutary example by plain and simple living. From 1796 until 1815 the per diem of a Congressman was $6 and the mileage $6 for every 20 miles traveled. Macon fought every effort for an increase, declaring that $6 per day while serving was ample pay, and he was scrupulous to collect only his actual mileage. In 1815 when the compensation was made $1,500 per annum, with a proportional reduction for any cause but sickness and in 1817 when the pay was changed to $8 per diem and $8 for every 20 miles traveled, both increases were opposed by Macon. Richard Rush, the American Ambassador to England under Monroe, says that the great English jurist reformer Jeremy Bentham told him in London in 1818 that the success of the United States Government would largely depend upon paying her officials low salaries. Bentham predicted that constant efforts would be made to increase the same but simplicity and direct responsibility could only be maintained by vigilance of the people in keeping the pay of public servants low. Macon fully shared this opinion. Expensive embassies abroad were not, Macon thought, in keeping with the simplicity of this Republic. America, too, would be better off if some of these plenipotentiaries from Europe never set foot on our shores. Lavished expenditures for fortifications he held of doubtful value. Given his way, no vessel of war should leave American waters without express sanction from Congress. A large standing army in time of peace was an unnecessary drain on the public purse.

In the last half of John Adams' administration Macon was chairman of the House Committee on Claims. For a claim to run the gantlet of his committee was like the proverbial camel passing through the eye of a needle. An appropriation of $14,000 to repair furniture for the President was a horrible waste of public funds. Macon later even begrudged his friend President Jefferson the postage on his letters. The proposition for a national university he successfully fought. Expenditure of $70,000 for a granite monument to General Washington was wrong in his opinion because it would prove an auspicious precedent for future memorials; besides, he added:

"If we decline raising a mausoleum to Washington, no man who succeeds him can ever expect one raised by the Government to his memory."

However, the bill passed by a vote of 45 to 37. But 16 years later when Governor Miller, by authority of the North Carolina Legislature, commissioned Macon to procure a suitable statue of Washington he entered heartily into the work and, by the aid of Thomas Jefferson, secured a marvelous piece of workmanship of Italian marble by Canova, which was placed in the rotunda of the North Carolina capitol, but was tragically destroyed when the capitol burned in 1832. Advocating the repeal of the Judiciary Act of 1801, Macon would, if for no other reason, be for repeal if thereby he could save the people even $1,000.

He opposed the gift of $4,000 to the daughters of Count de Grasse, and cast the solitary vote in Congress against the gift to Lafayette. He was uncompromisingly against any man accepting a gratuity from the Government, either as gift or pension. When the lobbyists for French spoliation claims were besieging Congress in 1856 one of Thomas H. Benton's last speeches was against these importunate claimants. Benton declared that he learned his lesson of senatorial responsibility and policy at the feet of the venerable Nathaniel Macon; that Macon, when considering any claim against the Government, conceived his position as legislator to be analogous to that of a judge on the bench, and no one dared to privately solicit Macon's support.

When the Sixth Congress met in 1799, with the Federalists still in control, Theodore Sedgwick, of Massachusetts, was chosen Speaker by only 6 votes over Macon. The Presidential election of 1800 being thrown into the House of Representatives, Macon was one of the 6 Republicans against 4 Federalists from North Carolina, and was thus able to cast the vote of his State for Jefferson. However, he listened to Jefferson's inaugural address March 4, 1801, with misgivings, fearful lest the President might be misled into some extravagance, but a few weeks later the master of Buck Springs was reassured by a letter from President Jefferson stating, "We shall push you to the uttermost in economy."

When the Seventh Congress convened in December 1801, the temper of the House was such that Macon was easily chosen Speaker, not as a partisan, for Macon declared if there were two parties he belonged to neither, but as a fair and impartial judge who best knew the precedents of the House. Besides geographical considerations recommended Macon to the favorable consideration of the northern adherents of Jefferson. The New England historian, Henry Adams, sums up the geographical situation at the time of Macon's election as Speaker thus:

"In some respects North Carolina, though modest in ambition and backward in thought, was still the healthiest community south of the Potomac. Neither aristocratic like Virginia and South Carolina, nor turbulent like Georgia, nor troubled by a sense of social importance, but, above all, thoroughly democratic, North Carolina tolerated more freedom of political action and showed less family and social influence, fewer vested rights in political power, and less tyranny of slave-holding interests and terrors than were common elsewhere in the South. The best qualities of the State were typified in its favorite representative, Nathaniel Macon."

The liberality of Macon in debate was frequently illustrated. Although the author of a bill in 1799 to repeal the sedition laws, he was free from personalities, declaring on the floor of the House in 1802 "Sooner than attempt to destroy the fame of these worthies (Adams, Hamilton, Marshall, etc.), to whose talents and exertions we owe our independence, I would cease to be an American." Justice Story, in his address on John Marshall, speaks of the acrimonious debates, 1799-1800, as "forever memorable in our political annals", and adds, "No man came out of the struggle with more distinction than Mr. Macon." Senator Otis, of Massachusetts, in debate with Macon in the Senate in 1820, asserted for his opponent a "real friendship and sincere affection" and "respect inspired by his honorable character", although "we have broken together many a political lance." Furthermore, while Macon was Speaker he expressed himself against the impeachment of Judge Chase, who had brought upon his head the wrath of all Jeffersonians by his enforcement of sedition statutes while riding the southern circuits. Macon did not believe a judge impeachable for political harangues before grand juries, though in bad taste. However, Chase was impeached by the House but acquitted by the Senate on every count, much to the chagrin of John Randolph, of Roanoke, who was manager on the part of the prosecution, but clearly in vindication of Macon's judgment.

Immediately upon his election as Speaker in 1801 Macon appointed his friend, the brilliant but eccentric John Randolph, of Roanoke, Chairman of the Ways and Means Committee. The Damon and Pythian friendship of these two men is one of the remarkable incidents in American annals. Macon was 15 years Randolph's senior. Macon stood about 6 feet, well proportioned, always strong and robust. Randolph was almost grotesquely peculiar in physique, but possessed an arresting and commanding personality, coupled with incomparable powers of sarcasm in debate. In his dress Macon always wore a double-breasted suit of best navy blue, turnover top boots, and immaculate linen. Randolph appeared in long black coat, a great white scarf about his throat. In 1802 Speaker Macon and Randolph lived together in a small house near where the Treasury Building now stands in Washington. Nearby they kept their horses. The journey from Buck Springs to the National Capital, 250 miles, Macon always made on horseback, while Randolph came the less distance from his home in his coach, bringing his pack of dogs with him. Both were hunters and delighted in following the hounds. Macon and Randolph differed frequently, but opposing convictions never even strained their devotion one to the other.

Following the census of 1800 Randolph and Macon disagreed as to the ratio for congressional representation, for Macon desired a ratio so small that every man might know personally his Congressman. Furthermore, Macon seems to have agreed with Alexander Hamilton's view that it would be preferable for Presidential electors to be chosen by congressional districts instead of by the States at large, and the electors were so chosen in North Carolina until 1816. After three terms Macon in 1807 relinquished the Speakership without a contest, "dragged down by Randolph's weight."

To regard Macon's career as simply a series of negatives is an error on the part of many historians who mention him at all. (His name does not even appear in the index of Woodrow Wilson's History of the United States.) Upon the very threshold of Jefferson's administration and long before Bonaparte surprised his minister, Talleyrand, and defied his blood brothers by proposing to sell to the United States the immense Louisiana Territory, to which his country held a rather dubious title, Macon had expressed himself as strongly favoring the purchase of Louisiana; also Florida and Canada, provided, of course, the prices were within the country's means. The necessary appropriation to pay France $15,000,000 for Louisiana had no opposition from him, though he agreed with Jefferson's private view that the Constitution contained no provision for the acquisition of territory and that an amendment to this purport might be desirable. However, when it came to governing the people of the newly added empire whom the Napoleonic treaty provided should be incorporated into the United States under the United States Constitution, Macon did not agree with John Randolph, Caesar Rodney, and others that Congress could empower the President to exercise all functions of government over the peoples of that vast territory; this theory of territorial government too nearly resembled despotism for Macon's approval.

The maintenance of local self-government undefiled was the very cornerstone of his creed. His conviction remained so strong on this point that 20 years later he was the only southern Senator who voted against the admission of Missouri as a State because certain legislative provisions by the State were required by Congress as a prerequisite to statehood. His conception that the Missouri compromise was unconstitutional was also in accord with the Dred Scott opinions of Chief Justice Taney and Justice Campbell more than 35 years later.

A century elapsed after the Louisiana territorial government debate before the Supreme Court of the United States in the so-called "Insular cases" (1901-5) held that lands acquired ceased to be foreign territory without being incorporated into the United States, and that until such incorporation Congress might withhold from the inhabitants thereof rights guaranteed by the Constitution to its citizens (Puerto Rico v. Topia, 254 U.S. 633). The Court then fully adopting the prior views of Chief Justice White. In fact, in 1829 John Marshall in the Canter case held that Congress could so provide a system of government for the Florida Territory. However, Macon's course in the acquisition and government of the Louisiana Territory was at least consistent in that he apparently maintained (1) that territorial expansion by the United States was necessary and should be consummated; (2) that the Constitution of 1789 had not provided for such expansion; (3) that territory acquired by purchase or otherwise was the joint property of all the States comprising the Union; (4) that being owned by the States the constitutional guarantees applicable to the States equally applied to the acquired lands and the inhabitants thereof, and particularly was this true under the Napoleonic treaty.

Certainly Macon escaped the inconsistencies of Randolph, who was extreme in his State-right theory, yet contended that the President or Congress, the National Government, could govern territory outside the domain of the States without constitutional authority or constitutional limitation thereon. Moreover, Macon was as nearly right as the Federalists, who asserted in the Senate that the Constitution only applied to the territory embraced within the Thirteen Original Colonies at the time of its adoption, and the Nation could apply a different system, if needs be, to either subsequent territories or possibly to new States. The incorporation idea long afterward advanced by Chief Justice White and finally adopted by the Court proved to be the golden mean between the two extremes, and is alone consistent with the now accepted theory that the United States is a nation.

Macon supported the embargo during Jefferson's administration, considering it the alternative to war, and was chairman of the House Foreign Relations Committee under Madison when the famous Macon bill no. 2 was enacted. This act was not written by Macon, however, but the authorship is ascribed to John Taylor. Convinced that American rights could not be secured by peaceful means and opposed to the unpatriotic attitude of New England, Macon heartily supported the Government in the declaration of and prosecution of the War of 1812, even voting for the required appropriations. This display of his patriotism is the more marked because he had not been an especial admirer of Madison, whom Jefferson made his heir apparent. In fact, prior to the election of 1808, Macon had expressed his preference as successor to Jefferson for either Gallatin, of Pennsylvania, the then Secretary of the Treasury, or for Clinton, of New York, above Madison.

Perhaps Macon is more responsible for the adoption of the twelfth amendment to the Constitution than any other one man. In December 1803, Senator De Witt Clinton, of New York, introduced the proposed amendment, which would allow the Presidential electors to vote for candidates for President and for Vice President instead of simply voting two names and the one having a majority in the electoral college becoming President and the next highest Vice President. The bill barely received the necessary two thirds in the Senate (22 to 10), and in the House the vote in January 1804 stood 83 to 42, 1 short of the required two thirds. It was not customary for the Speaker to vote except in case of a tie, but Macon had the Clerk record him "aye" and thus the bill passed. Macon's State was the first to ratify the amendment, but 12 other States acted favorably (New Hampshire failed to act, and Massachusetts, Delaware, and Connecticut rejected it), so that the amendment became effective in time for the 1804 election. (Twelfth amendment has fulfilled the prophecy of its Federalist opponents in that it nationalized political parties, lessened the importance of the office of Vice President, and has largely confined the choice for President to the larger and more important States, the support of which is deemed necessary for success.)

Notwithstanding the importunities of his friends in 1828, Macon resigned his seat in the Senate and as trustee of the State university and as justice of the peace, he having reached the allotted age of three score as stated by the Psalmist. He intended to let the next 10 years be the Sabbathical period of his life. Accordingly he retired to his Buck Springs farm, but continued to maintain a lively interest in local affairs, particularly in the young people of the community. When his admirers wanted to give a barbecue dinner in his honor, however, he declined, stating that he had never attended one of these big affairs. Like his friend Jefferson, he had entertained serious misgivings as to Andrew Jackson's presidential qualifications and had publicly criticized the latter's high-handed and unconstitutional course in Florida and favored the election of Crawford in 1824. There is evidence that John Quincy Adams would have endorsed Macon as his running mate in 1828. After Jackson's inaugural in 1829, his course, particularly with respect to the United States Bank, won Macon's approval and he soon declared that no one could have convinced him that General Jackson would render to the people the service he did.

When the election of 1836 approached the Whigs made a desperate fight in North Carolina, and in August 1835 elected their candidate for governor. The chances were that Van Buren would lose the vote of the State. Macon had come from his retirement to represent his county in the State constitutional convention of 1835, serving without compensation, and was unanimously elected chairman of that body, where he presided to the satisfaction of all sides. In the constitutional convention of 1835 Macon stood with Judge William Gaston in removing political disabilities from Catholics and Jews. With the ill results from a union of church and state fresh in his mind, he declared: "The mixture of politics and religion is the very essence of hypocrisy." Macon more than anyone else is responsible for putting an end to the pernicious practice of treating at elections, then held on muster day for the local militia.

Hence, when the Van Buren prospects seemed so gloomy, Macon was importuned to permit the use of his name to head the Democratic electoral ticket. This he finally consented to do and his aid thus given not only enabled Van Buren to carry North Carolina but was of great help to the Democratic ticket in other sections of the country.

The death of Macon, June 29, 1837, has become an epic, characteristic of his life. He had been ailing for a short while but on that June morning he recognized the approaching sunset of his earthly pilgrimage. He rose at his accustomed hour, bathed and shaved himself, ate his breakfast, sent for his physician, and, inquiring the amount of his bill, paid the same in full. Then he summoned the undertaker, made all arrangements for his burial, stipulated that those who attended the funeral should, according to the then-existing custom, be furnished dinner and grog. He requested that his old friend, elder of the little Baptist meeting house where he had long worshipped, might preach the funeral sermon. He also picked out the spot for his burial on a piece of sterile ground where no one would wish to plow, and directed that his grave should be marked only by a pile of flint rock, stones which no one could use for building. The undertaker, after these directions, was paid in advance and dismissed. About noon, all arrangements having been completed, Macon went to bed and quietly died. The heap of rough stones on the strip of barren ground near his Buck Spring house, the scene of the joys and sorrows of his long life, alone marks his final resting place.

Compared with contemporaries like Washington, the incomparable; Hamilton, Jefferson, Adams, Marshall, Webster, Clay, and Calhoun, perhaps Nathaniel Macon was neither an intellectual giant, nor a great orator, nor a brilliant debater, nor a fascinating leader, but by his common sense, his industry, his probity, his unflinching devotion to duty, he was a powerful figure in our national life for 40 years. As an exemplification of those stern precepts of rigid economy, of unostentatious democracy for the individual and the State, the career of Nathaniel Macon must ever remain preeminent.

ADDRESS BY HON. HARRY B. HAWES BEFORE THE IZAAK WALTON LEAGUE

Mr. WALCOTT. Mr. President, I present an address delivered by Hon. Harry B. Hawes before the Izaak Walton League at Chicago, Ill., April 27, 1933, on the subject of The League and Legislation, which I ask may be published in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Chairman, this annual national convention of representatives from 33 States of the Union speaks for an association which issues its monthly paper, employs experts, and in more than half of the States of the Union has not one but many chapters. It is, therefore, what might well be called a "grass-roots" organization. Its ramifications extend into local communities and down to the man who carries the rod and the man who carries the gun.

My subject is The League and Legislation.

Legislation in Washington at the present time is going through a unique crisis approximated only by that of war time.

Under ordinary circumstances conservation of our wild-life resources is presented to the proper committees of the House and the Senate, translated into statute law, accompanied by necessary appropriations, and subject, of course, to the approval of the President.

At the moment unusual powers are being delegated to the President, because we are facing the gravest financial and unemployment situation in our history.

Millions of men and women are without employment and dependent upon State, municipal, and national agencies for the necessities of life.

Farms are abandoned with their mortgages long overdue. Foreclosures have been forcibly resisted. Thousands of banks are closed, interest on drainage bonds goes unpaid, flood-control projects are curtailed or delayed. Factories are idle, wages cut, interest payments passed, the incomes of both rich and poor have shrunk. Private enterprises have reduced salaries, dismissed employees, and curtailed expenses. Now cities, States, and the Nation are doing the same things. The facts of the situation can hardly be exaggerated.

In such an emergency the granting of extraordinary powers to the President has been approved first by the Congress and now by the whole Nation.

IMPORTANCE OF RIGHT ADMINISTRATION

The outcome of this grant of power is necessarily dependent upon the genius and understanding of those who will be selected by the President to administer his program under it.

If the men selected by him as administrators have conservation in mind, have been students of the subject, and have had experience, then our conservation movement will be as successful as other industries in our national life.

Uncertainty in a national crisis means national prostration. The Nation has demanded decisiveness from our President. That is what Franklin D. Roosevelt is giving us. Drifting does not appeal to him nor to the American people. They even prefer mistakes to a policy of "do nothing." A mistake demonstrated as such may be corrected. So at least we can say that we are on our way. We are heading for something definite. The President is deciding, and his decisions are looking to solutions.

Our program can be served by the President's initiative and vision if conservation is recognized; if conservationists are consulted.

What is the attitude of President Roosevelt toward conservation?

To answer this question intelligently, we must consider the uncertain conditions in Washington. Many friends of the President—in fact, the leaders of the Nation—are refraining from discussing appointments or subjects of lesser import with him. They are waiting until the major problems are solved. It has not been deemed considerate to ask the President or the members of his Cabinet to discuss subordinate matters while major problems are awaiting action and solution. So, like many others, I have refrained from calling at the White House or intruding upon Cabinet members with advice and suggestions until the emergency programs are met. In my opinion, there will be time enough to do this when Congress has finally decided upon the full extent of the power with which it will clothe the President. At this time patriotic Americans are expected to "sit steady in the boat."

But I can at least express a personal opinion of the President's attitude.

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT SYMPATHETIC

Somewhat more than a year ago, when he was Governor of New York, I called on him in relation to his campaign, and he inquired why I had announced a year before that I would not be a candidate for reelection to the Senate. When I told him that I expected to devote part of the remaining years of my life to conservation, he expressed approval. He said it was a great public work; that it was a matter in which he had been interested during all his life, and that during his administration as Governor of New York he had given practical attention to conservation.

Later, on a western trip with him during the Presidential campaign, the matter again came up. He reiterated his previous approval of my course and said he wanted to help and that he would help.

I believe I can state that the President intends, as part of his program, and at the proper time, to give consideration to the wishes of the 6,000,000 men who take out hunting licenses, to the 7,000,000 men and women who take out fishing licenses, and to the annual amount of money expended for these sports, estimated at $650,000,000.

I believe I can state with certainty also that our President is conservation-minded, and that he will include in his broad national program a proposal for conservation and respect the views of the patriotic men and women who have devoted themselves so unselfishly and so wholeheartedly to this national cause.

We may rely upon him. We may trust him, I know, when the test comes in the administration of laws and policies.

The point I make is that it is not legislation but administration and official personality that most immediately concerns us in the matter of conservation.

My subject (for 20 minutes) is The League and Legislation. This naturally involves what might be termed the "ideal" in legislation, the completed National and State program which is the goal. But for the few years immediately ahead we must be controlled in our ambitions by the unusual conditions prevailing in our Nation and by the necessity of recognizing conditions and building a program which will make allowance for an abnormal and distressing situation.

BENEFITS TO BE SOUGHT

Accordingly, in asking for National and State aid, we must face the facts.

Individuals, clubs, and associations can be of assistance in our work, but the problem is too great to be handled privately or by purely local agencies or endeavors. It must be solved by the State and National Governments.

So our work must be persistent, intelligent, educational, persuasive. Our objectives are simple when understood, but there must be no slack in the effort to attain them. Our conservation calls for decision, even in the midst of these hard times.

There is now being proposed a 30-hour week, which means 6 hours a day for 5 days—2 days out of 7 to be devoted in part to the home, the church, and the outdoors.

What shall be done with this extra leisure? Shall it be spent in idleness or in healthful recreation? Healthful recreation is found very largely in the outdoors. Especially is this true for the urban citizens who now far exceed the number of suburban or rural residents.

The farmer is asked to curtail production. That means fewer acres under cultivation. What is to be done with these idle acres? Shall they yield only weeds and harbor predators, or be made a source of revenue for the farmer and a source of pleasure for his friends? If he utilizes his land for profit, why can we not assist and advise him, or in return for his privilege of hunting or fishing give him some hospitality that we may devise?

The President, in a congressional act for relief of unemployment, is authorized to carry on works of a public nature in connection with the reforestation of public lands, State as well as Federal. Specific mention is made of flood control, so the act covering both forests and waters, embraces such matters as soil erosion, pollution of streams, and development of game refuges and sanctuaries.

Conservationists have special cause for welcoming and applauding President Roosevelt's program of reforestation. Along with all other citizens we welcome it as a plan for relieving unemployment. As members of this great organization, we see in it also a recognition of the principles of conservation and a magnificent initiative on the part of the Executive that should lead to Federal expansion of conservation efforts in general.

This work of improvement and reclamation can be carried out on all State and National properties, including Army and Navy reservations. In addition there is a vast acreage of cut-over land now lying idle which, with the consent of its owners, might be developed into permanent forests and made into breeding places and habitations for game of all kinds.

The United States Supreme Court has decided in numerous cases that game preservation comes under the inherent police power of the States, and the State has the right to legislate concerning it as a valuable food supply, and for the general welfare.

Under our Migratory Bird Act and our treaty with Canada (which, by the way, should be extended to include Mexico), our Federal Government not only has the right but also the moral as well as the legal duty to protect migratory game birds.

So, too, control over navigable streams is lodged with the Federal Government. The issuance of permits to dam or bridge these streams is a Federal prerogative and function.

Land used for spillways in connection with flood control, especially where a flood occurs only once in 5 or 7 years, can be prepared for both fish and game during the intervening years; and, as these floods (while immeasurably disastrous to property and lives) last only for short periods, they do not present insuperable impediments to this useful purpose.

EVILS TO BE CORRECTED

The pollution of our streams is a continuous menace to our national health. There is no reason why this artificial contamination should not be prohibited and the waters of our rivers and lakes kept clean for drinking and bathing and at the same time be made habitable for edible fish.

For example, the water of the Potomac River (which passes our National Capital) is a threat to health, an offense to the eye, a proof of somebody's incompetence, a cause of humiliation, not only to residents of Washington and its environs but also hundreds of thousands of visitors.

The 6,000,000 hunters and 7,000,000 fishermen I have mentioned pay their own scores. From their pockets comes the cost of conservation. It is not borne by the general taxpayer.

A forest of regrowth timber is a congenial breeding place for birds and animals. It can be made habitable at this time with little or no expense. These regrowth forests will be undisturbed for many years—at least for another quarter of a century. Meanwhile they can become perfect sanctuaries for wild life of all kinds. In providing these forest haunts for birds and animals and clean waters for fish we shall at the same time be furnishing to our people the means of wholesome, healthful recreation and no inconsiderable source of food.

Under the powers given to the President this can be done without burdensome cost to our taxpayers.

Now is the time to use the unemployed in this work as well as in reforestation. It will increase the number of jobs; it will enhance the health, the pleasure, and the food supply of our people. They may also be usefully employed on marginal lands in the creation of wild-life sanctuaries and recreational as well as wilderness areas, in the devising of game covers, in the control of predators, in the supplying of food for birds, animals, and fishes.

How can this be done? By the creation of an advisory committee consisting of experts, men of the knowledge and experience of O'Malley and Radcliffe in the matter of fishes, men like Redington, Sheldon, and Henderson in the matter of birds and animals.

Or, if the President should prefer, there might be a volunteer committee selected by the officers of the Izaak Walton League, the American Game Association, More Game Birds, the Audubon Society, and various other such organizations, and representatives of the Senate committee on conservation of wild-life resources.

This is a brief statement of what the President may do without appreciable cost to the Nation.

CONGRESSIONAL ACTION JUSTIFIED

After Congress has disposed of its major problems, it should pass a revised Federal migratory-bird stamp bill to raise money for the purchase of additional sanctuaries and refuges for our migratory birds through fees paid by the sportsmen of America. The measure should be introduced now and pushed for final passage. This duck stamp bill will pay its way—the whole cost of its operation. It will entail no financial obligation upon State or National Government. Only sportsmen will pay.

It is unnecessary for me to advise this convention that the national conservation situation is deplorable. With only 24 national game wardens, with no money for the purchase of sanctuaries, with curtailment of funds and personnel in all branches of Government having functions with regard to conservation, the situation could hardly be worse than it is.

In the time you have allotted to me I cannot go into details. I have merely tried to point out the things the President may do, the things that Congress may do.

With an awakened sentiment, supported by the millions of men and women who pay for the pleasure and privilege of using a fishing rod or a gun, we can go far and accomplish much. We can do these things if the program is practical and not too ambitious for a period of distress like the present.

We may count upon our President. We may rely on Congress too, once it sees the need and the opportunity.

We must not fail, however, to repeat the warning that when the fishing rod is put away and the gun hung upon the rack, the greatest forces back of conservation will have become inert.

IMPROVEMENT OF CONDITIONS IN PAPERBOARD INDUSTRY

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the plan of the National Paperboard Association for improving conditions in the industry.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PLAN OF NATIONAL PAPERBOARD ASSOCIATION FOR IMPROVING CONDITIONS IN THE INDUSTRY

(Approved by executive committee Apr. 26, 1933; approved by western groups at meeting Apr. 27, 1933; approved by eastern groups at meeting May 1, 1933)

The members of the National Paperboard Association, comprising over 90 percent in numbers and volume of paper-board manufacturers, have approved the following statement and have requested its submission to the President of the United States:

The paper-board industry is a large and important one, employing approximately 50,000 persons. During the year 1932, and so far this year, it has operated at about 50 percent of capacity. (This statement is based upon complete and accurate statistics, which have been audited.)

Prices are demoralized to an extent which precludes profitable operation, and this condition has forced economies which have reduced wages and the number employed in harmful degree.

The members of this industry favor a 6-hour day in this emergency. They favor the payment of adequate wages. They favor the elimination of and a curb upon the unsound and the unfair in merchandising practices and prices, which bring chaos to business and a reduction in employment and wages.

Notwithstanding the above, the members of this industry oppose Government regulations of the hours of labor, of wages, and production. It is the opinion of the members of this industry that before the United States Government embarks upon the regulation of business other and probably safer remedies should be attempted.

Before industry is condemned and it is deprived of all freedom of action, it should be remembered that under laws now being proposed industry will be required to do those things which under existing laws it has been refused the privilege to do voluntarily. The many should not be penalized for the sins of the few, over whom all control has been denied to industry.

The members of this industry believe that if business will be permitted to act voluntarily, hours of labor will be reduced, employment will be increased, adequate wages will be paid, and industry stabilization—all to the public good—can be secured.

We recognize that any industry-stabilization plan which has the power to effect the necessary cures includes the power to abuse; that, therefore, for the protection of the public, governmental supervision is necessary. On the other hand, we believe that such governmental supervision will be better than direct regulation through statutory regulation of hours of labor, wages, production, and other business details. It is our opinion that the Government cannot embark upon such program of regulation without it developing new abuses, the curing of which will call for continued additional governmental control until a full license system will be in force and all liberty of the individual will be lost.

The members of this industry therefore respectfully request the enactment of a law that during the period of emergency (as the same may be declared by the President) the operations of the Sherman antitrust law shall be suspended with respect to any plan submitted to and approved by the President, acting through a bureau or representatives to be designated, which shall be responsible to the President, provided such plan shall have the approval of at least 75 percent in numbers and volume of the particular industry; that in case any such plan is so approved, it shall be binding upon and enforceable against all members of the industry; that the approving body may withdraw its approval at any time if operations under the plan shall be deemed to produce results harmful to the public welfare; that any such plan shall, as a condition to approval, contain therein provisions, which are fair and reasonable, covering hours of labor, rates of pay, and other protective features as may be necessary to safeguard the interest of the public.

As illustrative of the above, this industry, if legislation such as the above be enacted, will submit a plan which will, among other things, include the following:

1. A 6-HOUR DAY

(NOTE.—This would mean four 6-hour shifts on paper machines for 24 hours of continuous operation, in place of three 8-hour and two 12-hour shifts now prevailing. It is estimated that this will put 12,000 to 15,000 more men to work in this industry.)

2. ADEQUATE WAGES

We will agree that this wage for 6 hours shall not be less than the 1929 wage for 8 hours, adjusted—plus or minus—to the cost of living in 1929 as compared with the cost of living at any time hereafter prevailing, all as may be necessary so that the wage shall be proportionate and the purchasing power equivalent to that prevailing in 1929.

This will increase the cost of production. It is assumed that the Government will take action as appropriate to protect industries in this country from competition from foreign countries.

3. PRICE LIMITATION

A limitation on prices as may be necessary to prevent unreasonable profits and unfairness to the public.

4. STABILIZATION

The plan will not include agreements as to prices or limitations upon production. Allocation of customers, protection of existing volume, or trade position will not be included. The plan will, however, contain provisions which will operate as a curb upon demoralizing price cuts and other practices now recognized as damaging to industries and to public welfare.

Through recognition of, and adherence to, the principle that each member of the industry should control excess capacity, which is in proportion to the industry's excess capacity, individual operations of capacity in excess of the industry percent will be subject to a progressive tax at an amount per ton to be hereafter determined. The amount of this tax will be so fixed as to operate as a deterrent to volume seeking through unsound price concessions, but will not be so large as to preclude full and free competition under normal, healthy merchandising policies and prices. Penalties in the form of a tax will be applied as protective of wage levels and hours of labor.

5. ADMINISTRATION OF TAX FUND

This tax will be paid to trustees, and its collection will be enforceable by the trustees. These trustees shall be persons approved by the Government. Tentatively it is proposed that the industry shall appoint one, the Secretary of Labor shall appoint one, and the two so appointed shall choose the third. Broad discretion should be given the trustees as to the use of any fund so created. One purpose would be to use the fund as an unemployment fund; another purpose—all in the discretion of the trustees—would be the payment of rental for paperboard mills and properties, this by way of relieving the pressure of excess capacity and aiding through the depression companies which are facing operating difficulties. In case an operating mill should be so leased or carried by this fund, it is proposed that such taking over should be conditional upon the absorption by the industry of the labor of any property so shut down. This would permit of some control of capacity and the relieving of the pressure upon the industry of excess capacity, without at the same time giving the industry power to create capacity shortage. By such use, it is believed that the fund would operate to maintain employment and thus reduce the need of its use for unemployment.

It is appreciated that governmental supervision of operations under any plan is essential in order that its true effect and fairness in operation can be known. This industry will welcome such supervision.

Further details will be included as may be necessary and deemed proper for the benefit of capital invested, those dependent for their livelihood upon the industry, and the public.

The foregoing is not intended to cover details but to set forth the broad outline of the plan proposed.

Respectfully submitted.

No. 1 Wall Street, New York City.

CURRENCY REFORM—ADDRESS BY SENATOR BYRNES

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I ask that there be printed in the RECORD a very able and concise address upon the Thomas amendment to the farm bill, delivered over the radio by the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] on May 3.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Ladies and gentlemen of the radio audience, the House of Representatives today by a vote of 307 to 86 agreed to the so-called "Thomas inflation amendment" added by the Senate to the farm relief bill, making it certain that within a week this amendment will become law. The object of this amendment is to increase price levels. This purpose it seeks to accomplish by giving to the President the power to resort to three different proposals. The first directs the Secretary of the Treasury to enter into agreements with the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Reserve banks, under which agreement the banks will purchase Government obligations to the extent of $3,000,000,000.

This proposal is sound. It constitutes what is called "open-market purchases" by the Federal Reserve banks. It will result in putting $3,000,000,000 of Federal Reserve notes into circulation. As these Federal Reserve notes find their way into the banks, they can be counted as a part of the reserves of the banks and make it possible for commercial banks to secure additional credit from the Reserve banks. In this way the expansion of credit under this proposal will exceed $3,000,000,000. The proposal is safe. It is at all times under the control of the Federal Reserve Board, a group of men whose conservatism is recognized. They are directed to prevent any undue expansion. At any time they believe there has been sufficient expansion, they can sell all or a part of the approximately $2,000,000,000 of Government securities now held by Federal Reserve banks, which will have the effect of contracting credit just as the purchase of Government securities will have the effect of expanding credit. The criticism directed at this proposal is that it causes the officials of the Federal Reserve System to adopt a policy not initiated by them. Whenever the Government of the United States determines upon a policy of raising price levels, the Federal Reserve banks should cooperate with the Government. Should they cooperate in this policy, it is my opinion that the President will never resort to any of the other alternatives in this measure. Should they refuse to cooperate, then the President of the United States is authorized to resort to proposal no. 2, under which the Secretary of the Treasury would cause to be issued $3,000,000,000 of Treasury notes to be used solely for the purpose of purchasing interest-bearing obligations of the Government.

The effect of this would be exactly that which is sought to be accomplished through the Federal Reserve banks under proposal no. 1. As these notes were used to purchase Government obligations, there would be an expansion of credit. Practically, it would mean that the Government would substitute a non-interest-bearing note, which is a demand obligation, for an interest-bearing bond, which is a time obligation. The bond would be canceled so that the debt of the Government would not be increased. Behind the note, just as in the case of the bond, there would be the faith and credit of the Government of the United States. The retirement of the bonds would result in an annual saving to the Government of approximately $120,000,000 interest. The expansion is controlled not only by the limitation of the amount of notes but by the creation of a sinking fund, and annual appropriations are made of an amount equal to 4 percent of the outstanding notes for the retirement of such notes, so that the entire issue would be retired within 25 years. Critics express fear that these notes would not be accepted at par because not redeemable in gold. Today we are off the gold standard. The notes you have in your possession cannot today be redeemed in gold. Therefore there is no practical difference between the notes presumed to be redeemable in gold and the notes to be issued under this proposal.

Critics further express the fear that we will suffer the experience of Germany with its marks. They forget that in Germany there was no control of the issue of marks and no annual appropriation for retirement; that Germany had just been through a disastrous war and its resources were practically destroyed; that while Germany was hopelessly in debt, the United States is a creditor nation; that while the marks were used to pay current expenses, these notes are to be used to retire interest-bearing obligations of the Government; that while no effort was made to balance Germany's budget, the Budget of the United States is balanced. A government that can control its expenditures can control the inflation of its currency.

There is another power conferred upon the President by the terms of the bill. It would authorize him to fix the weight of the gold dollar if, as a result of an investigation, he finds it is necessary for the protection of our foreign commerce against the effect of depreciated currencies of other governments. It cannot be reduced more than 50 percent. As long as gold payments are suspended by the Government and you cannot demand the gold dollar, even from the Treasury of the United States, the question as to the weight of the gold dollar loses some of its importance. There has been a race among governments to cheapen money in order to obtain an advantage in international trade. Thoughtful persons agree that there must be an end to this competition. There must be an agreement by governments fixing the value for the currencies of every government in international trade. In any conference held for the purpose of stabilization of currencies our Government will be in much stronger position by reason of the increase in price levels, which has resulted from the introduction of this legislation and by reason of the power given to the President by this proposal.

While I have heard some men criticize this measure, I have yet to hear one offer a substitute. They would let deflation continue. The deflation of the past three and a half years not only destroyed values but destroyed the morale of the people. The introduction of this measure effectively stopped the deflation. It has increased the price of all commodities. The increased buying power of more than 30,000,000 people living on the farms of the Nation has increased the sales by chain stores and mail-order houses. It has increased the production of steel and today thousands of men are returning to work in the industries of the Nation. More than $500,000,000 in farm loans are held by banks of the Nation, whether open or closed. The increased prices of agricultural products has increased the price of farm lands, and this, with the increase in the value of the securities held as collateral by the banks, will make possible the opening of many banks now in the hands of conservators, thereby saving millions of dollars to the depositors.

The increase in the price of agricultural commodities, if it continues, may even make it unnecessary for the Department of Agriculture to resort to the allotment features of the agricultural relief bill. The employment of men in industry may make unnecessary a public-works program on the extensive scale at first planned, and certainly should result in reducing expenditures for the relief of the destitute and hungry.

In the face of this improvement in the business world, some politicians, who for the past 3 years have dictated the policies of the Government, are preaching the doctrine of despair. Last fall they declared that bad as things were, they might be worse. Today they prophesy that conditions will be worse. Unhappy are their days. I picture them presenting the blessings of deflation to a man who, as a result of the introduction of this amendment, has just sold his cotton or wheat at a profit, has paid his note at the bank, and is returning home with money in his pocket and hope in his heart. I sympathize with their plight as they tell the laborer who is today employed for the first time in 2 years that the dollar he earns will not purchase as much as it formerly did, for the American workingman knows that only with the end of the cruel policy of deflation can there be any demand for labor, and only with the demand for labor can there be an increase in wages.

It is urged that it will injure the holder of bonds and other investments with fixed income. This is true. For instance, the man who in 1918 purchased a $500 Liberty bond could at that time secure this amount of money by selling 4 bales of cotton, because cotton was then selling for 25 cents a pound, or $125 a bale.

Ten days ago if this investor sold his $500 bond, he could with the proceeds of the sale purchase 20 bales of cotton, because cotton was selling for $25 a bale. As a result of the introduction of this measure, cotton has increased in price from 5 cents to 8 cents a pound. This man who holds a $500 bond which he bought with the proceeds of four bales of cotton in 1918, could today secure for his $500 only 12 bales. The same illustration could be made as to every agricultural commodity. The plight of this investor does not arouse great sympathy. He is not entitled to have the Government continue a policy of deflation in order to enable him today to purchase with his $500 five times as much as he could have purchased with it in 1918. The inability of the debtors of the Nation to discharge their obligations at the price level prevailing for the past 3 years has demoralized business and threatened the very structure of our Government. As banks failed, as corporations went into bankruptcy and families were driven from homes, unrest and fear gripped the people.

Today, under the leadership of President Roosevelt, hope has supplanted fear. Action has supplanted inaction. Something is being done, and try as they will, the politicians cannot destroy the confidence of the people in the leadership of the President. They know that when the President was inaugurated on March 4, every bank in the Nation was closed, and with intelligence and courage he proceeded to place our banking system on a solid basis; that he found a Treasury with a huge deficit, increasing at the rate of $5,000,000 a day; and, in 30 days, he had balanced the Budget without levying additional taxes upon the people. The people have no fear and cannot be frightened into believing that Franklin D. Roosevelt will exercise the discretion placed in him so as to permit any wild inflation or unwise expansion. They trust him. Their confidence is not misplaced.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, MAY 4, 1933

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D.D., offered the following prayer:

O God, our everlasting Father, we have in Thee the source and the magnificent disclosure of all those virtues by which we live, by which love is sanctified and true friendship made. The whole soul of gratitude incites the song of praise. Hear our prayer, blessed Lord. In these days of wide-spread distress, open all hearts to be bountiful; to give themselves more and more to the unfortunate. Our Father, join us all together in the unity of a true brotherhood. We pray for more willingness, for more patience, and more confidence in all our fellow citizens. Take us unto Thyself, dear Father, save us all from selfishness, from false pride, from envy, and fill our lives with the spirit of love and benevolence which shall bring the summertime of cheer and the promise of a new day to all institutions and to all homes everywhere. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House is requested, the bill (H.R. 4589) entitled "An act making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934, and for other purposes."

The message also announced that the Senate insists upon its amendments to said bill, requests a conference with the House thereon, and appoints Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma, Mr. GLASS, Mr. KING, Mr. NYE, and Mr. KEYES to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House is requested, a bill of the House of the following title:

H.R. 5081. An act to provide for the common defense; to aid interstate commerce by navigation; to provide flood control; to promote the general welfare by creating the Tennessee Valley Authority; to operate the Muscle Shoals properties; and to encourage agricultural, industrial, and economic development.

ALLOTMENT OF TIME IN GENERAL DEBATE

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 7 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Busby]?

There was no objection.

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Speaker, I asked for this time to make a little explanation.

I made a point of order on yesterday afternoon when we were proceeding with very few Members present that there was no quorum present. I was not "peevish." That is not what caused me to do that. I have discussed with the Speaker when he was floorleader and with other gentlemen in authority the manner in which the time of this House is doled out and the fact that the ordinary Member of the House has no standing when it comes to having any say whatever about how the time is to be divided or to whom it is to be given. It so happens that the Committee on Appropriations has many measures on the floor of this House, and the time of the House is absolutely farmed out to the chairmen of the subcommittees of the Committee on Appropriations as to how the time of this House shall be used and as to whom it shall be given. I remind you gentlemen who happen to be in the positions I have mentioned, members of the Appropriation Committee, that it is not your time you are dealing out. It is the time of this House and of the Congress, which belongs to the country.

On yesterday afternoon we proceeded in the usual way and one gentleman continued on the floor with continued allotments of time for quite a while. He made an interesting talk. A number of others were waiting for time without knowing anything about what to expect. There was no limit on the amount of time that might be yielded by the gentleman on the majority side or the gentleman on the minority side, members of the Committee on Appropriations to whom the unlimited time of the House has been farmed out. So after that had concluded the gentleman on the minority side proceeded indefinitely, in a nonchalant sort of way, to yield time to one gentleman who was making a very interesting speech, and who spent some 10 or 15 minutes reading a letter he had received from a corporal in the Army. This gentleman, it is true, is very distinguished and has served notably in the United States Senate for some time, and we were glad to hear the gentleman, but it so happened that that thing went along until the undemocratic situation confronted us very forcibly. It is not a personal matter with me, but I want to suggest to those gentlemen that they were not doling out their time, but our time, and the Committee on Appropriations assumed the role of consuming the time of this House without limit, and as to whom it shall be given and as to how long they shall speak.

Mr. TABER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUSBY. In just a moment. Now, it so happens in times past a Member could ask unanimous consent and get a special order to address the House at a time definite, and that time could be arranged, and Members who wanted to hear the address would know about it. We are proceeding in a most indifferent sort of way as a deliberative body. We are treated as an institution that merits no consideration, and almost all the Members leave. I resent that sort of tactics, and I do not think that policy makes for very much good for the House of Representatives. I intend to continue making points of order as to a quorum, as I have a constitutional right to do, and we are either going to adjourn or we are going to have Members in this body to listen to the speeches that are made. [Applause.]

I have never asked anybody to elect me Speaker. I have never asked to be elected to the chairmanship of the Appropriations Committee. I have not asked for anything special, but we have certain constitutional rights, and every new Member of this House has those same rights, and that is the right to be considered a Member of the House.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUSBY. I yield.

Mr. DOWELL. Is it not true that the gentleman's side of the House has so amended the rules and is so applying them that the only opportunity an individual Member has now is to talk? He has no right to make any amendment to the bills offered or present any legislation, as far as I am able to learn. Is that not coming from the gentleman's own side of the House?

Mr. BUSBY. I am not defending anybody. I hope the gentleman understands that. [Laughter and applause.] I want to say, further, that we are criticized by newspapers for passing legislation with only a few Members present to consider it. If our time is not of enough importance and our deliberations are not of enough importance for us to attend to them and for us to organize our time so that we can have intelligent discussion of the issues, such as the country is entitled to have, we ought to adjourn and all go to our offices.

Mr. BACON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUSBY. I yield.

Mr. BACON. The time is equally divided on both sides of the aisle, and we reserve the right to apportion our half of the time as we see fit. I assure the gentleman that, as far as Republican Members are concerned, they are all going to be given a chance to talk if they ask for time.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUSBY. I yield.

Mr. O'CONNOR. The gentleman realizes, of course, that there are almost three times as many Democrats as there are Republicans in this House.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. But they do not make as good speeches.

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Speaker, to continue my thought, I want to remind the gentleman from New York that he is not yielding his time; he is yielding our time.

Mr. BACON. If the gentleman will yield further, we were given half the time to yield with which to take care of Members on our side of the aisle.

Mr. BUSBY. That is not what I am talking about, but of the system under which the time of the House is allotted, not by the House but by the Appropriations Committee on all subjects, which precludes everybody but members of the Appropriations Committee when it comes to discussing matters on the floor.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUSBY. I yield.

Mr. JONES. I should like to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that in making these points of order he may interfere a good deal with the work of the House. For instance, we have a rather important conference which will be in session all during the afternoon. I hope the gentleman will defer the starting of his program until tomorrow.

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Speaker, I am not speaking in a personal way. I am speaking in defense of the principle which I think ought to be carried out in this House—of the House or Speaker controlling the time of the House on general debate instead of farming that time out through the Appropriations Committee. This principle is not being maintained. This situation is nothing personal to me.

Mr. JONES. I have no thought of taking issue with the gentleman on the subject that is under discussion. I merely wanted to express the hope that he would not find it necessary to continue no-quorum calls, and thus make it difficult to do the conference work this afternoon.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. JONES. I agree thoroughly with the gentleman that there should be a liberal division of time, but I was just hoping he would not see fit to have a continuous roll call this afternoon in view of the importance of this conference and certain other matters that are pending.

Mr. BUSBY. Until we get this thing settled in a fair way to Members there is going to be something done.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Further, if the gentleman will permit, following up the statement of the gentleman from Texas, I hope the gentleman will not make his points of order when the Rules Committee is in session, as they may be this afternoon, bringing out important rules for the consideration of the House.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUSBY. I yield.

Mr. TABER. I may say to the gentleman that on this side of the aisle, not only when we were in the majority but when we are in the minority, we have taken care of those on this side insofar as we could equitably. Now, if there is some disturbance over on the other side of the aisle as to how the time over there is to be apportioned, I should think that you might call a Democratic caucus and settle the question.

Mr. BUSBY. That is a wise suggestion, but I may suggest to the gentleman that there is no aisle in the question I am talking about. The time you get is my time and it is the time of the other Members and belongs to the House, which fact the members of the Rules Committee and the Appropriations Committee do not seem to realize. You, the Rules Committee, bring in a rule invoking banking and currency legislation, and farm legislation, and the Rules Committee reserves to itself all of the time of debate which was 5 hours, in addition to the 1 hour the rules of the House give the Rules Committee on all rules presented.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts rose.

Mr. BUSBY. And the gentleman from Massachusetts, who is now standing asking me to yield, is one of those members of the Rules Committee which appropriated unto itself the 5 hours' time provided under a rule reported by his committee.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I should like to ask the gentleman if he has not voted for all these rules. I voted against them all. What does the gentleman say about that? [Laughter.]

Mr. BUSBY. I do not think it would have made any difference which way the gentleman voted; it would have been just the same.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this is all I have to say, and I say it in defense of the principle that I think ought to be maintained by this House.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUSBY. I yield.

Mr. KELLER. I am not able to understand why—and I should like to have it answered if it can be answered—why one third or almost one fourth of this House should have half the time.

Mr. DOWELL. I can answer the question.

Mr. KELLER. The gentleman looks as though he might be able to. Let us hear from him.

Mr. DOWELL. Because the Democrats have adopted rules that do not permit us to offer any amendment or in any way perfect any bill presented under a rule.

Mr. KELLER. Is the gentleman willing to help change these rules so we can do the thing I am suggesting?

Mr. DOWELL. There never has been a time in the history of the House when there was not an equal division of time on both sides of the aisle.

Mr. KELLER. Why should there be when the division of men is so unequal?

Mr. TABER. Because there ought to be an opportunity to even up the time between those for and against a measure.

Mr. KNUTSON. And the Republicans are the only ones who are informed.

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Speaker, in conclusion may I say this point I raise is not a party matter, this is not a division-aisle matter, this is not a political matter. This is a question of fundamental principle and of right, that the most humble Member of the House of Representatives is entitled to be considered.

Mr. KELLER. I agree with the gentleman thoroughly.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 3 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, this is a tempest in a teapot. We decided that general debate on this bill should continue yesterday afternoon with no limit; that the time was to be equally divided between the Republican and Democratic sides. We have just heard complaints on the Democratic side about the division of this time, yet every man who requested time got the time he asked for on this side. [Applause.] Even the gentleman from Mississippi himself [Mr. BUSBY] requested time, and he got the time he asked for. So where is any just complaint?

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yield.

Mr. WOODRUM. Our colleague complains about the Appropriations Committee's consuming time. Is it not a fact that the Appropriations Committee now is just in charge of the time in order that the Members may have an opportunity to make speeches if they wish to?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes; in charge of the time and giving everybody who requests time the time he asks for.

Mr. BUSBY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes; I yield.

Mr. BUSBY. I have not got at all heated up over this, and I am not referring to yesterday. I have no complaint about the fact that time was not given me. I did not consume any time. I hope the gentleman will recall that.

Mr. BUCHANAN. No; the gentleman withdrew his request voluntarily.

Mr. BUSBY. I withdrew my time voluntarily, because I decided that the principle I was going to stand for was worth more than the speech I might make, and I did not care for any time on that occasion; and I have no complaint today any more than last month or next month, and I may say—

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yielded for a question and not a speech.

Mr. BUSBY. Well, we will see about that later.

Mr. BUCHANAN. All right; we will see about it.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yield.

Mr. SNELL. I may say that the statement of the gentleman from Texas is absolutely correct. I went to him yesterday and told him that several gentlemen on this side wanted some time. The gentleman said, "We will take all the time necessary on this bill", and, so far as I know, he has carried out his statement.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Let me reply to the gentleman by stating that so far as the division of this time is concerned, this morning the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] and myself have entered into a tentative agreement to limit the debate to two hours and a half, and the gentleman from New York has generously agreed to allow 30 minutes more on this side than on his side. I say this in fairness to that side of the House. This is a tempest in a teapot.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 3 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I do not know what all this disturbance is about—

Mr. BUSBY. If the gentleman will yield, I will tell him in a moment.

Mr. BYRNS. Let me make this statement. I think I understand my friend from Mississippi. He is a very valuable and a very useful Member—

Mr. BUSBY. No compliments, please.

Mr. BYRNS. And I think every Member of this House, especially those that were in the last session, know that the gentleman from Mississippi always gets all the time he wants on any subject he wishes to discuss.

The only reason I have asked for this time is because there has been a statement made which leaves the impression that an effort is being made by someone, somewhere—of course, the gentleman lays it at the door of the Appropriations Committee, and I can speak in behalf of that committee, because I am no longer a member of it—but I say that he has left the impression that somewhere, in some way, efforts are being made to stifle Members and prevent them from giving expression to their views upon matters of public moment.

I call my friend's attention to the fact that in the beginning of this session, while we were waiting for legislation to come from the committees, when we were meeting here day after day with very little business to do, the House on many occasions remained in session just as long as was necessary to give everybody who wanted to do so an opportunity to discuss any subject he pleased. The gentleman knows there are 313 Democrats upon this side of the Chamber, and there are about how many on the other side?

Mr. SNELL. Not enough. [Laughter.]

Mr. BYRNS. I wonder if the minority leader has ever counted them. [Laughter.] But there are something over 120 Members on that side. The custom has always been, and it is a proper one, to divide the time for debate between the two great parties in this House, and we have never had any trouble about it.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BEEDY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be continued for 2 minutes in order that I may ask him a question.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maine?

There was no objection.

Mr. BEEDY. The gentleman from Tennessee has correctly stated that there has been plenty of time permitted for discussion, but I want to ask the gentleman if he will not now state to this House that as the leader of his party he will henceforth attempt to give the Members of this House a chance to offer amendments to legislation, rather than merely stand up here and talk about it.

Mr. BYRNS. I may say to the gentleman from Maine that, in my judgment, the Democratic Party has given just as liberal, and even more liberal, opportunity for amendment than the gentleman's party did when it was in power. I call attention to the fact that out of the bills that have been passed several have been open to amendment. Personally I favor considering all bills with the right of amendment, except where there are extraordinary reasons for not doing so.

Mr. BUSBY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. In just a moment.

Mr. BUSBY. The gentleman has referred to me several times, and I think the gentleman should yield.

Mr. BYRNS. I shall yield to the gentleman in just a moment.

Now, in the case of a few bills that were highly involved and where the slightest amendment would serve to defeat the plans of the President of the United States, there have been rules brought in denying the right of amendment.

Mr. MAY. And it takes a lot of time to accommodate 315 Members.

Mr. BYRNS. Absolutely.

Mr. BUSBY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. BUSBY. I should like to say that there is nothing personal about this and the gentleman is wholly in error in trying—

Mr. BYRNS. I am not seeking to make anything personal out of it.

Mr. BUSBY. I made no imputation that would cause the gentleman to think that this is a matter personal to myself.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DISNEY. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

DUTIES OF THE DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing an address by the Secretary of Agriculture, Hon. Henry A. Wallace, over the national radio network of the National Broadcasting Co. on Monday, May 1, 1933.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by Secretary of Agriculture Henry A. Wallace over the network of the National Broadcasting Co. Monday, May 1, 1933:

In this series of radio broadcasts it is the custom, as I understand it, for each Cabinet officer to do a little boasting about his own department. I am more than willing to do my share of that on behalf of the Department of Agriculture; but in my remarks tonight I hope not only to discuss the past of this Department, but also to consider its future.

Necessarily, that involves the new farm bill. By tonight I had hoped to be able to talk in some detail about it, but since the bill has not yet become law, detailed discussion will have to wait. In lieu of that, let me discuss the view that the new bill is the logical next step in the work of the Department of Agriculture in particular and of all government in general.

In order properly to appraise the work of this far-flung Department of the Federal Government, suppose we cut through a tedious underbrush of official and legal language, and set forth, in plain words, what the Department of Agriculture was established to do.

If you have thought about mankind's struggle through the ages to build an orderly society, you will agree that there have been two primary problems: First, to produce enough food and fiber to feed and clothe us all; second, to divide what we produce as equitably as possible.

We have always had to be concerned with production. Whatever else man can do without, he cannot live without food. And that was no simple problem back in the days when men lived in tribes in the forests, and when the food supply depended upon a man's skill with crude weapons. When the first faint stirrings of commerce and industry drew men to live in larger groups, in cities, the problem of a food supply became even more acute. Those who lived in the ancient cities could not grow their own food and fiber. Those who remained on the farm had the new job of growing enough not only for themselves but for other families in nearby cities. Thus the dependence of the city dweller upon the farmer is overwhelmingly real. It is the key-log in this structure we call modern civilization.

And there were times when the structure was in danger of collapse, or indeed did collapse, because the key-log weakened and gave way. By reason of abnormal seasons, drought or flood, famines came and wrecked whole segments of human society.

It was customary to blame those catastrophes on nature. Man, weak creature, was powerless if nature chose to starve him, or drown him, or otherwise maltreat him.

Somewhere back in the ages a few individuals more daring, more imaginative than the rest, began to wonder whether that was true. They reasoned that though nature could not be ignored it could be modified. Man began doing that when he learned how to make fire by rubbing sticks together. We have been modifying the behavior of nature ever since to prevent famine, flood, and other disasters until, as Julian Huxley puts it, man has done more in 5,000 years to alter the biological aspects of the planet than nature has done in 5,000,000 years.

By putting nature in harness, so far as possible, we have solved mankind's first great problem—the problem of producing enough food to go around. We have solved it too well, as a matter of fact, but I shall speak of that later.

When it is possible for the farmers of a nation to increase production 50 percent, while crop acreage is increasing only 25 percent, we know that science has been at work. That is exactly what has happened in the United States during the past 30 years. In large part it is a result of the scientific work of the United States Department of Agriculture and the cooperating State institutions.

It was for the purpose of putting science to work in agriculture that this Federal Department of Agriculture was established by act of Congress 71 years ago. Washington, Jefferson, and Franklin saw the need for it even back in their day. The Department was created primarily for scientific research, its main job always has been a research job, and I hope research will always remain a principal duty.

Of course it is not enough to discover facts; a public institution has also the obligation to see that the facts are made available to all who can profit by them.

When a plant breeder in the Department develops a variety of wheat that is highly resistant to rust, the job of the Department has not ended with that discovery. The new variety has to be tried out in various regions in the field. Next the results of those trials have to be made known to wheat growers. That involves publications, both technical and popular, and articles for the press and radio broadcasting. Then the seed of the new variety has to be made available to farmers. The county extension agent may step into the picture at this point and suggest that the interested wheat grower sow some of the new seed in a test plot alongside some of the seed he and his neighbors have been using in the past. And when the old and the new varieties of wheat are up and are harvested, let the neighbors for miles around come in to compare them and decide whether or not the new variety is better than the old and worth investing in.

That is a thumbnail sketch of the way science is applied to agriculture in this country, and it portrays a system that is the envy of many another nation. Sir Horace Plunkett, Ireland's great authority on agriculture, in 1928 was moved to describe the Department of Agriculture as "the most widely useful department in the world." I am inclined to agree, and I only hope that its future will be as brilliantly successful as its past.

Whether he knows it or not, every farmer in the United States is farming differently today—and better—because of the scientific discoveries resulting from State and Federal appropriations. The average hour of man labor and the average acre of land is undoubtedly 20 to 30 percent more productive today because of this scientific work. From the fundamental point of view—that of supplying the food and fiber needed by our modern civilization—the millions of dollars spent by State and Federal agencies during the past generation have been abundantly worth while.

I appreciate that it is often difficult for the layman to see any earthly use in many of the things that scientists do and talk about doing. Of what value is it to you and to me, for instance, for a man to spend his time trying to discover the workings of nature? How can a man—we are inclined to say—do anything useful unless he works directly with the things that we all can touch and see, that we know have practical utility?

Well, when confronted by questions like that, I think of men like Faraday and Mendel, and some of the scientists in the employ of the Federal Government. About a hundred years ago in England Michael Faraday was what we might call an experimental philosopher. He never concerned himself with the invention of machines. His sole aim was to learn something about the workings of nature. He discovered the principle of electromagnetic induction, and if you remember your high-school science, you will recall that without that discovery, we would today have no means of putting electrical energy to work for us. Without Faraday, the amazing inventions of Edison and Marconi would not have been possible, and your radio and your electric lights would not exist.

And Mendel, that cloistered Moravian monk who whiled away the hours studying plants, and experimenting with the cross-breeding of varieties of garden peas—of what earthly use was all that? He did it because it interested him. But was it of any use to the rest of us? I can assure you that it was, for the principles he discovered have been employed by the plant breeders of today in developing more productive varieties of every plant that feeds and clothes you. Scientists like Mendel and Faraday were working in what we call pure science. They were trying to discover nature's fundamental secrets but without thought of any practical application of their discoveries. Had some over-zealous administrator tried to restrict their curiosity to some specific object or the immediate solution of some highly practical problem, we would have been deprived, in all probability, of their great discoveries.

It falls upon another group of scientists to apply these basic principles to the pressing problems of the world and turn them to practical account. Thus most of the scientific research in Government departments is applied science. The surprising thing, however, is that even in the field of applied science far-reaching discoveries are made, often as a by-product of the immediate task.

One of the most famous examples was the discovery by scientists in the Department of Agriculture some 40 years ago that a microorganism found in the blood of cattle is the cause of splenic fever and that the disease is transmitted by the cattle tick.

During the years 1888 to 1893 four men spent most of their time trying to make that discovery. Splenic fever had become a costly disease of cattle throughout the South. Home-made remedies, treatment by skilled veterinarians, alike proved futile. The disease was costing the livestock industry and ultimately the consumer of meat many millions of dollars.

The four Department of Agriculture scientists, in the employ of the Government because they wanted to pursue scientific research without interruption, and at salaries sadly out of line with their worth to the Nation—these men kept doggedly on the job despite all sorts of obstacles and disappointments. The joy of achievement was their chief reward. And their achievement proved to be of lasting benefit not only to the livestock industry but to all mankind, for their research was the first demonstration that a microbial disease can be transmitted exclusively by an insect host or carrier.

From that came the knowledge, at the hands of other scientists, that yellow fever, malaria, sleeping sickness, and other maladies are similarly transmitted. From that flowed the successful control of yellow fever, for instance, which in turn made possible the building of the Panama Canal. So it can truthfully be said that the success of four Department of Agriculture scientists in discovering the cause of a cattle disease was a first step in the construction of the Panama Canal.

These scientists—by name, Theobald Smith, Curtice, Kilgore, and Salmon—of course, had no idea of the far-reaching consequences of their discovery. They were intent on finding the cause of a cattle disease, not in discovering a fundamental principle in medicine. But that happens often in scientific research.

And at other times a scientist may fail to solve one problem only to solve another unexpectedly. Not long ago some chemists in the Department of Agriculture were examining molds—fungous growths, that is—to find one that would produce tartaric acid. Patiently they tested one after another, until they had exhausted the possibilities of 149 different molds. Finally the one hundred and fiftieth rewarded their long search with success—but not the success they were expecting. Instead of producing tartaric acid, the one hundred and fiftieth mold unexpectedly produced gluconic acid. This is now used in making calcium gluconate, the only calcium salt that can be injected between the muscles without causing abscesses, in treating certain human diseases. This salt used to cost $150 a pound. As a result of this research, it may now be had for 50 cents a pound.

Much of the scientific work of the Department, however, calls for more than the ordinary equipment of a scientist. I am thinking of the plant explorers, the men who cut their way through treacherous jungles or press on across the forbidding deserts of Mongolia in search of plants that we need here at home. Whenever you eat bread made from durum wheat, or enjoy a choice steak or pork chops from cattle or hogs fed on alfalfa and soybeans, or sample a package of dates or a crate of navel oranges from California, or the new Satsuma oranges from Florida—whenever you enjoy any of these things, you are reaping the benefit of the work done by a handful of explorers employed by the Department of Agriculture.

If you live in the Gulf-coast region, you probably are familiar with the rise of a new industry down there—the growing of tung-oil trees. About 25 years ago tung oil revolutionized the manufacture of varnish, but the oil had to be imported from China. Back in 1905 David Fairchild, plant explorer of the Department of Agriculture, brought the first seeds of the tung trees to the United States from the Yangtze Valley of China. Our plant-industry men discovered, after a good deal of experimentation, that the trees do well in the Gulf-coast region, and the new industry is today firmly established there.

Not every trip of a plant explorer, of course, is so productive. Every trip has its dangers and its adventures, but frequently the results are slight. Yet the introduction of a navel orange, or a useful variety of soybean, or a hardy wheat atones for many unsuccessful trips.

In one way or another, I have said, every farmer in the United States is farming differently today because of the scientific discoveries resulting from State and Federal appropriations. To be specific and as up-to-date as possible, suppose we run down the list of research achievements reported by one bureau of the Department of Agriculture for the past year. Before me is a summarized report for the Bureau of Plant Industry, and among their accomplishments I find these items:

Established the superiority of 5 new hybrid lines of corn in Iowa tests; released, for the use of growers, 2 new lines of hybrid sweet corn that will be resistant to bacterial wilt; released, for the use of growers, a new wilt-resistant variety of tomato, known as the Pritchard; introduced a new blackberry variety, the Brainerd, especially adapted for the West and South; and also introduced 3 improved varieties of strawberry; developed new rootstocks for Satsuma oranges, and found new disease-resistant stocks for California grape vineyards; introduced a new sugar beet, U.S. No. 1, that is resistant to the costly curly-top disease and that also greatly outyields older varieties; tested some promising new sugarcane seedlings, crosses of American and New Guinea varieties; reported distinct progress in breeding alfalfa that will be immune to bacterial wilt; developed a new variety of Egyptian cotton in Arizona.

As another part of its job, this bureau investigates the storing, handling, and processing of foods. For the year under report the bureau scientists discovered, among other things, that putting apples in cold storage immediately after picking almost completely prevents soft scald; that adding sulphur dioxide to the sawdust packing of grapes retards the development of mold; and that treating fruits with carbon dioxide before shipment is as effective as precooling in preventing spoilage.

That is a partial report of the research accomplishments of one bureau. It gives point to the statement that research can stabilize crop production and eliminate or reduce those hazards—of disease, of climate, even of soil—which make agricultural production uncertain. For it remains true that though drought or disease or insect pests may raise the price of a crop by reducing the supply, such higher prices are cold comfort to the particular farmer whose cotton has been destroyed by the boll weevil or whose wheat has been hit by rust. I have, I think, a proper scientific respect for insects and diseases, but I question whether we ought to leave it up to them to determine the size of our crops and the level of our incomes. Nor can I forget that every year, according to Dr. L. O. Howard, the damage wrought by insects nullifies the labor of a million men.

If time and your patience permitted, it would be possible to cite instances to show how research has affected all of our major farm crops and classes of livestock; how the patience, the skill, and the informed imagination of scientists employed by the Department of Agriculture have altered the agricultural map of this country and modified the farm practices of every farmer in the land. Many farmers are not aware of this, for the results of research reach the individual farm by an intricate, devious path, but they get there just the same.

If you will agree with me on that, I suspect you are at the same moment questioning whether this research has proved to be an unmixed blessing. For science and invention, you will say, have not only made it possible for us to produce enough to go around; they have made it possible for us to pile up towering surpluses, which in turn seem capable of bringing our whole economic system crashing down around our ears.

We cannot deny that. When scientists in the Department of Agriculture develop a variety of wheat that produces 5 bushels more per acre than the variety commonly grown one result may be, and often is, too much wheat. When our modern knowledge of nutrition enables 1 bushel of corn to go as far as 2 bushels did in the pioneer days in feeding livestock one result may be too much pork and lard.

Of late years the Department of Agriculture and the colleges have been aware of the problem. They have tried to meet it by helping the individual farmer adjust his own production to changing market needs. They have hoped that advice and complete information on supply and demand would suffice.

Where they have been remiss, in my judgment, is in declining to face the fact that the individual farmer cannot adjust his production intelligently unless he knows with some degree of certainty that his neighbors will do likewise. And it is to face that fact realistically that the new farm bill has been drafted. The essence of it is collective action by all the producers to accommodate their production to the market that actually exists.

Our expenditures for science, our efforts at increasing productive efficiency, have in no sense been unwise. Certainly no thoughtful person could approve the abandonment of scientific research or the relegation of our machines to the ash heap. To do that would be like abandoning the use of automobiles because we have automobile accidents. As a rule, the fault is not with the automobile but with the driver.

It is not the fault of science that we have unused piles of wheat on Nebraska farms and tragic bread lines in New York City at one and the same moment. Rather it is because we have refused to apply science to the development of social machinery—machinery that will regulate our economic system to the end that what we produce can be equitably divided.

I am not one to ask for less efficiency. I want more, and I know that we can get far more. But I want the efficiency to be controlled in such a way that it does more good than harm. I want to see the farmers of the South grow 300 pounds of cotton per acre instead of 150 pounds, and the farmers of the North 50 bushels of corn per acre instead of 35 bushels. I want to see the average milch cow yield 400 pounds of butterfat per year instead of 200. And I see no reason why our hogs eventually should not produce 100 pounds of pork on the average from 6 bushels of corn instead of from 9 bushels.

These things can all be done. The research now going on will make it possible and will pave the way for countless new agricultural achievements as well.

Only the other day I learned that research now in progress indicates that crops grown in some regions of the Nation have a higher nutritional value than do apparently similar crops grown in other areas. If further study bears this out, the consequences will certainly be far-reaching. We may have a new agricultural map a decade from now.

The research job, far from being done, is only well begun. We shall need new varieties of cereals and grasses to resist diseases better than those we now have. We shall have to keep cutting costs of production by increasing yields per acre. Methods of cultivation, like methods of feeding and managing livestock, must be subject to continuing investigation if we are to keep abreast of the continually changing economic world about us.

When our chemists, not long ago, discovered an economical method by which bagasse, a sugarcane waste, could be made into high-quality cellulose, suitable for rayon, we patted ourselves on the back for an achievement of considerable importance. But over in the Bureau of Chemistry and Soils is a small bottle of a brownish cellulose substance called lignin, which was derived from the corn plant after many years of experimentation. The chemist will tell you that lignin is one of the principal parts of woody plant tissues; that it can therefore be obtained in abundance; and that it may yield a startling new collection of products. Already he has discovered in lignin such compounds as phenol and cresol. Lignin may yet rank, in its rich potentialities, in its influence on disposing of farm wastes, with our major chemical discoveries.

No; the job of scientific research in agriculture is not over nor will it ever be. But today we have a new job, a new field for experimenting—that of social control. Research to increase productive efficiency, to widen markets, must continue. Eliminate the less important research activities, in deference to the need for economy; get rid of the deadwood in our scientific organizations—but keep the men of science at the tasks which will always need doing. And add to the old job, the one that has been begun so well, this new job of developing the machinery of social control.

Can we, do you suppose, become as efficient in our social experimenting as we have already proven ourselves in scientific experimenting? If this can be done, we can go ahead into one triumph after another in the scientific world. If it is not done, I fear for the future of our civilization.

The farm bill is an effort in the direction of such social inventiveness. In some ways it is perhaps as crude as the first automobile. But I believe it is profoundly right in purpose, for it attempts a reconciliation between science and social justice; and I believe it can be made to work if the rank and file of the people of the United States—the men who grow our food, the men who handle and distribute it, the men and women who consume it—the new machine will work if all these people are genuinely hungry to distribute the fruits of science in a just way.

For that is our great modern problem. Having conquered the fear of famine, with the aid of science, having been brought into an age of abundance, we now have to learn how to live with abundance. Sometimes I think it requires stronger characters, greater hearts, and keener minds to endure abundance than it takes to endure penury. Certainly it requires a new degree of tolerance among competing economic groups and a willingness to subordinate the will of the few to the welfare of the many.

Personally, I think the last 12 years have imprinted this lesson deeply on all of us. I think we are ready now to reach out toward a new order. I believe we are ready to attempt to plan our economic life in return for stability and security. If this is true, then we have reached a great moment in the history of mankind. We have determined to become the masters rather than the victims of destiny. We are daring to bring the economic interests of men under conscious human control.

We may make mistakes along the way; we may have difficulty in mastering all the intricacies of an economic system that is full of puzzling contradictions; but if we operate our new social machinery with the spirit of social justice in all our hearts, I believe that it will work.

THIRD DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL, 1933

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of H.R. 5390, the third deficiency bill; and pending that motion, I ask unanimous consent that general debate be limited to 2 hours and 30 minutes, 1 hour to be controlled by the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] and one hour and a half by myself. This is to comply with the requests for time promised yesterday.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. McREYNOLDS in the chair.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CASTELLOW].

Mr. CASTELLOW. Mr. Chairman and members of the Committee, on yesterday I had the pleasure of listening to a very interesting discussion by the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS]. Early in the discussion he used this language:

I have been here 20 years, and it seems to me a great pity that Members of Congress cannot assemble and, figuratively speaking, sit around the council table and, without oratory and without passion, give intelligent, constructive consideration to their difficulties.

Immediately upon that statement I made the request for the time which I am now consuming.

We have in our economic organization a maladjustment which lies at the seat of our trouble. The physician who has a patient ill seeks to intelligently diagnose and discover the origin of the trouble.

Quite often it has occurred to me that there is a marked similarity between the physical body and the body politic. Not only that, according to my judgment, the statesman bears the same relation to the body politic as does the medical doctor to the physical body. If there is a disease of the physical body from which we suffer, there is a perfectly logical reason for its existence, though we may be unable to discover the cause. Many unfortunate citizens have gone to their graves without the cause of the malady ever being ascertained.

So if we are suffering from disease in the body politic, it behooves us to at least undertake to diagnose the case and find the cause of the disease. Oftentimes physicians cannot agree upon this very important question. I apprehend, sir, that oftentimes those who are called to pass upon the condition of the body politic cannot agree, as has been evidenced here during my service in this distinguished body.

According to my diagnosis, there are five fundamental causes of the trouble from which we are suffering today. I know that some of you will not agree with me fully upon all of my conclusions. However, I desire to submit them to you for your consideration. In doing so I shall mention these causes, with respect to importance, in reverse order.

The first, I would say, is governmental extravagance. Our taxes, as we all know, have grown to tremendous proportions not only in the Federal Government but in the State Government, the county and municipal government, to such an extent that I understand the President of the United States, before a congress of Governors in the State of Virginia, made the statement that the people of America are called upon to pay annually the staggering sum of $13,000,000,000. I feel most of you will agree with me upon that subject.

The next is one upon which I am sure some will not agree with me. That is the alienation of American trade by unfortunate or, as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] would say, maladjustment of our tariff legislation. This is a controversial question I thoroughly realize, and I have not, of course, the time to discuss it now, but that is a part of my diagnosis.

Third, the dissipation of American wealth by investment in practically worthless foreign securities. I apprehend some effort will be made to correct that trouble. I have about come to the conclusion that an American citizen should not have the right to own an interest in a foreign government, in other words, to buy a bond of a foreign government, for the reason that, by way of illustration, when one invests a thousand dollars in a German bond, he automatically becomes $1,000 German, and what we need in America is that every citizen be 100 percent American. [Applause.]

The fourth and, to my mind the most serious question confronting us is the very great increase in the use of labor-saving devices without due regard and provision for the laborers displaced, thereby increasing the ranks of the unemployed. I think we all agree that we are not suffering so much from overproduction as we are from underconsumption. Just a few years back the students in the colleges found employment in Texas helping to gather the wheat crop when the harvest period began, and they followed the season through to Canada. Now what have we?

We have the wheat, we have the crops, we have the young men who need the jobs, but the machines do the work. Year before last in a trip through the West, in the western part of Kansas, driving along one evening, I looked to the left of the road and there saw a great pile in a field that seemed to be sawdust, but I knew it could not be because there was not a tree that was not planted by hand within 50 miles of that spot. I found upon investigation that it was a great pile of wheat, as yellow as gold, and almost as heavy, threshed, ready for the mill, piled in the fields, exposed to the weather, decaying, sprouting, while in the city 100 miles away, strong men and feeble women walked the streets begging for bread. I inquired of two young men near by as to who had produced these crops. They replied, "We did." I then asked, "What help or labor did you employ?" The answer was "None." Then I asked how many acres they cultivated to produce this great pile of wheat. The answer was "1,000." By the use of improved machinery they were able without assistance to cultivate this large area and produce this abundant crop. Gentlemen, this is the problem confronting us now which will cause more trouble in its solution than any other question before us.

The fifth, I would say, is the most important of all, and would have produced this condition, in my judgment, without the aid of the other four. That is the tremendous increase in our obligations necessitating the payment of a multitude of debts with a handful of money. We give to the medium of exchange a dual nature. The primary purpose of money is to function simply as a medium of exchange. As such, we do not expect it to earn anything. No one expects a profit from the money he carries around in his pocket or keeps in his checking account at the bank. Nothing whatsoever; that is, when devoted to its primary purpose and used simply as a medium of exchange. But we gave it another nature. We consider it as having intrinsic value, and as such expect it to earn us something in the way of rents, which we call simply interest. It is here that the trouble begins. When it is treated as a commodity with intrinsic value, it then becomes subject to the laws governing other property of similar character. We know what would happen if there were only 5,000,000 bales of cotton in the United States and that was owned by members of the New York Cotton Exchange, and the outside public had sold to these men who own the cotton already 200,- 000,000 bales of cotton. It is very apparent what would happen under those circumstances and conditions.

If there were only 5,000,000 bales and the outside public had gone short 200,000,000 bales, and delivery time comes, could the obligations be met? Could it be done? It could not. To deliver what does not exist is simply a physical impossibility. That is exactly where we are today in reference to our financial obligations, and that alone, without the other four causes I have mentioned, would have put us in the position which we now occupy. It might not have done it quite so quickly.

Now, what is the remedy? One of two things must happen. There is no question about it. There is only one of two ways out, and that is that those obligations die a natural death or else that the money with which to liquidate those contracts be increased. That is the proposition. The danger which lies in inflation I understand very clearly. I have some reason to know something about what inflation means, unbridled and uncontrolled. I was one of those unfortunates who invested in German marks, yet I am convinced of this, that a railway train may be run from one side of this country to the other on an even speed of 40 miles or 38 or 42 miles, whichever you decide upon, if you place it in the hands of a competent engineer who has at his command two things; but he must have them. He must have steam and he must have brakes. He must have the moral courage and ability to use either one that is needed. If he will do so, he can keep that engine on an even speed of 40 miles an hour, upgrade and downgrade.

So with our commercial system, place the power of inflation and contraction in competent hands, and if used wisely, honestly, and courageously, business can be maintained on practically an even keel; but that is where the danger lies. We in America especially not only like to ride but we like to ride rapidly. We all say, "Let us put on the steam now; let us get over this grade." After we pass over and things are booming and the track behind us is disappearing the engineer reaches for the throttle to cut off the steam, the passengers say, "Stop; you are our engineer. We put you in this place. This is our train and she is running good. Let her go." But he says, "She is going 45 miles an hour." "It does not matter. The faster the better." He says, "It is going 50 miles an hour." "Well, that is not dangerous." "It is going 60 miles an hour." "Well, she is just going good. Let her go." That is where the danger lies—in uncontrolled power.

We have two media of exchange. The legal medium, money, and the practical medium, commercial paper. The usual cause of what we term "prosperity" is inflation of the practical medium, commercial credit, controlled by financiers who expand and contract it at will for their own profit and to the impoverishment of the Nation. This condition must be replaced, to some extent, at least, by a controlled currency resting in more impartial hands. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CASTELLOW] has expired.

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. McREYNOLDS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill H.R. 5390, the third deficiency appropriation bill, had come to no resolution thereon.

An act granting the consent of Congress to the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania to construct, maintain, and operate a free highway bridge across the Allegheny River at a point near the Forest-Venango county line, in Tionesta Township, and in the county of Forest, and in the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania.

On May 1, 1933:

H.J.Res. 135. Joint resolution to amend section 2 of the act approved February 4, 1933, to provide for loans to farmers for crop production and harvesting during the year 1933, and for other purposes.

NATIONAL TRANSPORTATION POLICY (H.DOC. NO. 32)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and ordered printed:

To the Congress:

The steam railways still constitute the main arteries of commerce in the United States. At this time, however, available traffic is not sufficient profitably to utilize existing railway facilities and the supplementary facilities provided by new forms of transportation.

Our broad problem is so to coordinate all agencies of transportation as to maintain adequate service. I am not yet ready to submit to the Congress a comprehensive plan for permanent legislation.

I do believe, however, that three emergency steps can and should be taken at this special session of the Congress.

First. I recommend the repeal of the recapture provisions of the Interstate Commerce Commission Act. The Commission has pointed out that existing provisions are unworkable and impracticable.

Second. Railway holding companies should be placed definitely under the regulation and control of the Interstate Commerce Commission in like manner as the railways themselves.

Third. As a temporary emergency measure, I suggest the creation of a Federal coordinator of transportation, who, working with groups of railroads, will be able to encourage, promote, or require action on the part of carriers, in order to avoid duplication of service, prevent waste, and encourage financial reorganizations. Such a coordinator should also, in carrying out this policy, render useful service in maintaining railroad employment at a fair wage.

The experience gained during the balance of this year will greatly assist the Government and the carriers in preparation for a more permanent and a more comprehensive national transportation policy at the regular session of the Congress in 1934.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, May 4, 1933.

THIRD DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, for the further consideration of the bill (H.R. 5390), the third deficiency appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H.R. 5390, with Mr. McREYNOLDS in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. DEEN] 10 minutes.

Mr. DEEN. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the opportunity to express my feelings or attitude on a given proposition. If there were a subject for what I wish to say, it would be

"National Interdependence." I am convinced more than ever before that Members of Congress have a splendid opportunity to help mold for the country at large the sentiment and spirit of interdependence as related to the whole Nation.

There has come into this country of ours a feeling that those of you who are from the North, those from the East, and the West, and those of us from the South have nothing in common. If I may have your attention for a moment I want to direct your thought and your interest to this idea, that soon after the printing press was invented there appeared in the United States of America that spirit of getting the news of the country to the people of the Nation. From the word "north" we took the letter "n", and then from the word "east", and the words "west" and "south", the first letters, and taken together they formed the word "news."

So from the North, the East, the West, and the South, the four great directions of the country, there came that spirit of patriotism on the part of our forefathers in order that the people of this Nation might develop the spirit of cooperation, the spirit of something in common—interdependence.

My friends here from the North, East, and West, your problems are mine and mine are yours. I may say, not in the spirit of criticism, this aisle separating, as it has all these years and does today, the two great political parties of the Nation has been overemphasized. No one appreciates his party, the Democratic Party, more than I do, but the problems of the people in the North, in the East, in the West, and the South are the problems of all the people of the United States.

Of course, my first obligation is to the people of my district, and I serve my Nation best when I serve my district well, but I have no patience with the person who, because of a spirit of demagoguery or a spirit of selfish greed, holds his section over and above the interests of the entire Nation. I am one of those men who believes that in the Nation there is this spirit of interdependence, loyalty, and patriotism.

"Inter", originating from the Latin, means "between." Your problems and my problems constitute a national necessity for action by this body. In other words, you and I are charged as Members of this House with the responsibility of helping to create good will and put forth in the Nation this spirit of interdependence. It is some of our business what the people do. It is certainly some of their business what we do. Many reasons are given for present conditions in this country. I shall not reiterate those enumerated by my friend and colleague from Georgia and the Members who have preceded me in this House, but may I say that the one thing which, perhaps, as much as any other has caused the people of the United States great difficulty, suffering, and distress is the mechanistic age in which we live, the machine age?

Shortly there will come before this House a bill which will seek to reduce the hours of labor to 6 per day and the days worked per week to 5. Let me say, not in the spirit of protest but in the spirit of fair play, that this bill will force the manufacturing and industrial enterprises of this country into the spirit of seeking more machines to do more work in shorter hours. Labor-saving machines will, therefore, increase and labor will suffer the consequence. In my judgment nothing of a more perilous nature to labor can come in the United States than this shorter-hour proposition, for it will result in more machines. I hope the Congress will not enact a 13-month law, because 12 monthly payments are about as much as most of us can make on the average installment-plan purchase. I hope, however, that Congress will be considerate of the unfairness to labor of the Nation, induced by the development of the machine age. This is one proposition.

Another proposition is that throughout the country, and especially among the common people, the class from which a great many of us come, there is hunger and starvation and the majority of the people have no money. You know, the poorer a man is the more children he has. Everybody knows this fact. Poor people are raising practically all the children. Rich people do not have children any more, or at least they do not have many children. Most of them have poodle dogs in their cars and homes.

Most of the common people of this country, the merchant, the small-town banker, the business man, the millions of fine young men and women employed in our stores and factories, on our farms and fields, the school teachers of the Nation, the other people who are working for wages or small salaries, and approximately 40,000,000 farmers are absolutely without money. A great many of them are without food and clothing. There is spreading throughout this country a spirit of rebellion and largely so, because the money of the country has been impounded into the hands of a few through special legislation. Let us analyze this for just a moment. Our Government, the United States Government, either ought to get into the banking business or ought to get out of the banking business.

There is in the Postal Savings System of the United States around $1,000,000,000, interest on which is guaranteed at 2 percent. Under this system when a person's account reaches $2,500 he is permitted to convert it into 2½-percent bonds in an unlimited amount, guaranteed by the Government of the United States.

Mr. Chairman, only a few Members are here. I want to impress upon them this, and I shall not trespass upon the time of the House, for my time has almost expired: The Federal Government ought either to permit the people to issue checks against these deposits and go into the banking business or it ought to get out of the banking business. In my judgment, there should be more business in the Government and less Government in business. Thousands of small-town banks, such as those in some of our districts, have gradually been going down because the strong arm of the Government has taken out of our respective counties, communities, and States, from the small banks, the money that ought to be there. I am one who opposes this unfair accommodation to the money hoarders. [Applause.]

A guaranty of bank deposits in country banks, as well as the proposed guaranty for the Federal Reserve System, is imperative if confidence is to be maintained in banks. If it is good for the Federal Reserve System, it is good for the country banks. I am opposed to the Government being in the banking business through the Postal Savings. If it is all right for the Government to guarantee the safety of money in a country-town post office, why cannot it guarantee the same money in a country-town bank?

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH].

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present. There are only 50 Members on the floor.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. COOPER of Tennessee). The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and twenty Members are present, a quorum.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I rise to exercise about the sole remaining right of a Republican Member of the House of Representatives, and that is to speak in general debate.

I propose in the time allotted to me to discuss from an utterly nonpartisan point of view two subjects, one at the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DE PRIEST], the Negro and communism, and the larger part of my time will be devoted to a discussion of the deplorable situation in Cuba.

The gentleman from Illinois spoke yesterday on the Scottsboro trial and the American Negro. He asked me to discuss the Communist aspects of that trial and the Communist activities among the 12,000,000 Negroes in America.

I am no alarmist. I do not anticipate any revolution from Communist sources tomorrow morning at dawn, or the next day, or the next year. I am satisfied that the Regular Army, the National Guard, the American Legion, and the Veterans of Foreign Wars, using a Russian word, or the equivalent of a Russian word, could liquidate all the Communists in America in a few weeks' time if they tried to put on a Communist revolution in our country.

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Chairman, I am sure a quorum is not present. This is an important subject, and I think this discussion should be heard by the Members of the House. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order there is not a quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and twenty-six gentlemen are present, a quorum.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, one of the major activities of the Communists in America is directed toward spreading a revolutionary spirit among the 12,000,000 American Negroes. The Communists have the idea, or at least the orders coming from Moscow—and I have seen them myself repeatedly—urge the Communist Party of America to concentrate and emphasize in every possible way their revolutionary activities among the Negroes of the North and of the South.

Numerous Negroes have been sent over to the revolutionary training school at Moscow in order to learn the strategy and tactics of revolutionary communism, and come back here to spread these vicious doctrines among the Negroes of America.

As I stated previously, I am not an alarmist and I do not believe that these revolutionary activities among the American Negroes are going to succeed. I am simply stating to you a fact, that it is one of the major objectives of the Communists who believe that the Negroes are sort of colonials, in the European sense, and that they do not belong in this country and that they are not part and parcel of it. They forget that the American Negroes have lived here for several hundred years; that they have served in all our wars; that they are loyal and patriotic American citizens and believe in our institutions, in our Government, and in the American flag. But the Communists, taking advantage of what they believe to be the inequalities and the prejudices that exist in certain parts of the country, seek to stimulate and encourage a revolutionary spirit, a revolutionary point of view among the Negroes, and the main reason they have not succeeded is the fact that the American Negroes—and you gentleman from the South know it as well as anyone else—believe in God and are a church-going people, and when they find out that the Communists preach hatred of God and hatred of all religious beliefs it does not make much headway among the American Negroes.

Mr. DUNN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I would rather proceed a little farther.

I rise for the purpose of supporting the contention made by the gentleman from Illinois that if the Scottsboro case results in the death sentence and execution of the 7 or 9 Negroes now being tried in Alabama, it will be regarded by the Negroes of the North and probably the Negroes of the South as a miscarriage of justice, that will do more to spread communism in America than all the activities of the Communists have done in the last 15 years.

There is no question but what the Communists are already parading the Scottsboro case as a part of their revolutionary propaganda. They point out that 7 or 9 young Negroes, under 21 years of age, one of them 13 and another 14, were tried and one of them has been sentenced to death because he was charged with attacking two women of the underworld, according to the judge who presided—two women of low character. One of these boys has been sentenced to death in spite of the testimony presented by one of the white women that they were not attacked and in spite of the testimony of one of the white boys that neither of the women was attacked. These young Negro boys have been in jail already for 2 years, and I say to you, as one who knows somewhat of the issue he is discussing, that if these young boys are sentenced and electrocuted it will be regarded in the North and among the Negroes of America as a miscarriage of justice. The Communists are already saying in every country of the world that there is no such thing as justice in America for the Negro—for the same human beings, for the same American citizens who served in the armed forces of the United States, who paid the supreme sacrifice and whose lives are just as dear to them and their families and their wives and their sweethearts as the life of any white man.

Only a week or so ago four white men were arrested in Warrenton, in the State of Virginia, for attempting to rape a young colored girl 12 years of age. Does any thinking Member of Congress, no matter whether he comes from north or south of the Mason and Dixon's line, believe that these 3 or 4 white men will be condemned to death and executed for attempting to rape a harmless, innocent, and defenseless colored girl 12 years of age? Just reverse the picture, and I say to you, in all fairness, without any partisanship, without having read the record of the Scottsboro trial, except in the newspapers, that I know enough of Communist revolutionary propaganda in this country to say to you gentlemen of the South that if these young boys are electrocuted, it will put a weapon in the hands of the Communists who seek to tear down our homes, our laws, our country, and our flag, such as they have never had, to show not only to the white and the black but in foreign lands that there is no justice in America for the Negro when American Negroes can be tried without a single member of their race on the jury and sentenced to death for attacks on white women of the underworld.

I did not intend today to speak of the Middleburg case in which Judge Lowell, of Massachusetts, refused to extradite a Negro. I know enough of that case to know that if Crawford, the Negro in the case, is guilty of this murder, it is one of the most brutal and outrageous murders ever perpetrated in this country. If this is the man who perpetrated the murder, the sooner he is sentenced to death and electrocuted, the better for the laws and the people of this country. I hold no brief for him, but I am glad I voted the other day against the impeachment proceedings of Judge Lowell, a man whom I know personally, a man of the highest character and integrity and ability as a lawyer and as a judge.

Mr. LEE of Missouri. I do not believe that.

Mr. FISH. We want to be fair to Judge Lowell no matter whether we agree with his decision in this extradition case or not.

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Chairman, I do not think there is a quorum present, and I make the point that there is no quorum present.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the motion is not in order. A quorum was present a few moments ago.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. COOPER of Tennessee). That is a matter within the discretion of the Chair. The Chair will count.

Mr. BOYLAN. A parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BOYLAN. Does not the Chair think that when the same motion is made three times within the period of a half an hour that it is made for dilatory purposes? I think it is trespassing on the generosity of the Chair in presenting the motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The matter is within the discretion of the Chair, and the Chair will determine it by counting.

Mr. BOYLAN. A parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. A parliamentary inquiry is not now in order. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and nine Members present—a quorum.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I want to continue where I left off in the defense of Judge Lowell. The only reason I do it is the fact that although he was ably defended by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] on the floor the other day, he did not have in his possession the fact that the Negro who came before Judge Lowell pleaded not guilty, and also he did not present to the House at that time the fact that Judge Lowell said that the reason for his action was merely to expedite justice in order to get the Negro charged with the murder to trial quicker, because the case would have to go to the Supreme Court on constitutional grounds, anyhow, and it would save time to determine the constitutional question first. It was to expedite justice and not to retard it that Judge Lowell rendered his decision. He said so at the time, and I am sorry that nobody had an opportunity, because of the limited debate, to take the floor and state those facts. I do not believe the House would have acted as it did to institute impeachment proceedings against Judge Lowell and virtually recall a judicial decision, for that is what it amounts to, if it had all the facts placed before it.

I want to say one word further, and that is that the International Labor Defense, which is representing the Negroes in the Scottsboro case, is an out-and-out communistic organization, and has been from the beginning, and nobody denies it. They are prepared to use this case in every way within their means as revolutionary Communist propaganda. Therefore, I say to you that the verdict in the Scottsboro case, as the gentleman from Illinois pointed out yesterday, is one that may cause American Negroes to despair of justice in certain parts of America.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I decline to yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York declines to yield.

Mr. FISH. I do not say that anyone in this House can change the verdict, and I do not say that any one of us, no matter what our opinion is, can affect the judge. As far as I am concerned, I believe the judge conducted himself with the utmost integrity in that case. I am not in any way impeaching him. I am merely serving notice of what the result will be if these boys are condemned to death. It will do more to spread revolutionary communism among the Negroes and among some of the whites in America than anything else the communists can do for themselves.

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. COLMER. To ask the gentleman from New York just the purpose of this debate, and what he would do about it, or what he would have the court in Alabama do about it. What good purpose can be served by such a futile line of argument when the matter is in the hands of the court? Would he take it out of the hands of the court and have it tried before this body?

Mr. FISH. I think that has already been decided by the judge himself who has stopped the trial temporarily, because of the charges of prejudice that have already been made. I think the judge is competent to handle the case. I think he has shown himself to be impartial from the beginning and can be depended on to protect the rights of the defendants even though they are Negroes.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Just what is the connection between the Crawford case and Judge Lowell and the Scottsboro case?

Mr. FISH. The connection between the two is this, that in the Scottsboro case the question of constitutionality arises after the verdict has been given, after the sentence has been declared, while in the Middleburg case, or Crawford case, instead of having it go to trial, where a constitutional question was bound to be raised, because there were no Negro jurors, it goes directly to the court of appeals, and then to the Supreme Court. In other words, one is the reverse of the other, but the same principle is involved.

I have studied this Negro question for a good many years, and I am glad to say that the Commonwealth of Virginia has been fairer to the Negroes than almost any other State in the South. There have been fewer lynchings in the Commonwealth of Virginia, and there has been more justice to the colored man, and the colored man has had his rights protected more in that State than in any other. So there is no reflection, as far as I am concerned, to be drawn from what I say about the Crawford case against the State of Virginia.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. COX. Does the gentleman approve of the judicial behavior of the Massachusetts judge in the Crawford case?

Mr. FISH. The only answer that I can give the gentleman is that I think it was a rather unusual decision. All I can say is that the judicial body representing the lawyers of Boston and vicinity voted unanimously to support the judge in his decision. I thought it was a rather unusual decision.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Is it not true that the contrary is the case? They did not support him on the legal proposition at all, but they simply testified to his integrity. They did not undertake to uphold his legal position.

Mr. FISH. I think they upheld his decision.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Is it not a fact that the gentleman is trying to present a moral question, to show the connection between communism and this Negro trial? What is going on is giving the Communists an opportunity to spread their propaganda because of a condition that has arisen in those cases.

Mr. FISH. That is the purpose of my remarks. It is to show the connection of communism with the Negro, not only in the Scottsboro case but in other ways. The Scottsboro case is merely a weapon put into the hands of the Communists throughout this country who are trying to incite Negroes to a revolutionary spirit by pointing out the injustices, inequalities, and prejudice that exist, so that it will arouse a racial spirit and class hostility.

Mr. LEE of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I cannot yield any more. That is the entire purpose of my remarks, and I think that every southerner and every northerner who understands the situation wants to do everything in his power to see that communism does not spread among the Negroes or among the whites, because if we let it get started once and let these radicals among the Negroes—and there are some I am sorry to say—make headway and use this and other trials for spreading their poisonous doctrines against our institutions and republican form of government, then it will be an unfortunate day for our country.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I desire to discuss a resolution which I first offered some months ago in the last Congress, and which I reintroduced on March 15 in this Congress. I want it distinctly understood that when I speak on the Cuban situation I do so from a nonpartisan point of view. I desire simply to emphasize the tragic conditions that exist in this island 100 miles south of Florida, and to point out to the Members of the House that they have certain duties and obligations under the Platt amendment. The American public probably does not even know that the Platt amendment exists, and I doubt if many Members of Congress even know what it means or what its provisions are. The Platt amendment guarantees to the Cuban people a government adequate to preserve life, property, and individual liberty, and every man and woman in this room knows that life and liberty today are not protected in Cuba under the military dictatorship that exists there. When I say I approach this from a nonpartisan point of view, I say so because the recent Republican administration was absolutely blind to the terrible conditions in Cuba. It ignored them completely.

So whatever the Democrats do to remedy the situation, at least they will be one step ahead of the last Republican administration, that evaded its responsibilities under the Platt amendment and did nothing to help restore civil liberties in Cuba or to put an end to a state of terrorism that has existed there for several years. I do not deny that Cuba is an independent nation, but I submit that the United States did not go to war with Spain, at the cost of American lives and the expenditure of large sums of money, merely to drive out a brutal Spanish military dictatorship to have it replaced by an equally despotic Cuban military dictatorship, that has even closed the University of Habana, which for 200 years under Spanish rule was always kept open. Even if there were no Platt amendment we would have a moral obligation to use our friendly office to preserve the freedom and liberty we gave the Cuban people.

I happen to know Mr. Sumner Welles, who has just been sent as Ambassador to Cuba. I have the highest regard for his qualifications, for his experience, and for his ability. I am led to believe that he will be able to solve that difficult problem for the best interests of the Cuban people, consistent with American interests and obligations under the Platt amendment. There has been no discussion on the floor of this House or the Senate or in the United States of the frightful conditions that exist in Cuba, which are almost identical to those that existed 35 years ago, that so aroused the resentment and anger of the American people that they went to war to free Cuba from a brutal and foreign power. They did not go to war at that time on account of the sinking of the Maine. They went to war to put an end to oppression, bloodshed, and terrorism, practically the same conditions that exist today.

Military censorship is so strict in Cuba that it forbids any mention of police activities, assassinations, arrest of political prisoners, or political disturbances. This strict censorship on Cuban news makes it difficult not only for the American public but for the Cuban as well to learn the truth.

I want it understood, because I have been repeatedly misquoted, that I am opposed to armed intervention. I am opposed to annexation or any kind of armed intervention in Cuba. It is not necessary. But it is time for the United States by diplomatic mediation to end the veritable reign of terror in Cuba. All we need do is to take a firm position, and to say to General Machado, the military dictator of Cuba, and his illegal government, that terrorism must cease and that civil liberties must be restored. Our new Ambassador should stand squarely on our obligations under the Platt amendment and demand that a provisional government be established adequate to preserve life and individual liberty, and that the Cuban people be given an opportunity to elect their own President by the provisional government within 1 year. It is the duty of the Congress—it is the duty of the Federal Government, therefore—to say to the military dictator of Cuba, supported by fear and force and violence, that he must get out; that the American Government has a moral obligation and a legal obligation to restore civil rights and liberties to the Cuban people.

I had no sympathy with the past administration in its bombardment of Japan with paper notes some 6,000 miles away, where we had no rights and no obligations. Only recently, when the Nazis persecuted the Jews in Germany, there were mass meetings of protest held throughout this land against a country where we had no rights and where we had no duties and no Platt amendment. The reason is there are 4,000,000 Jews in America. The reason there is no protest against these outrages and atrocities at our doorstep is simply because there are only 4,000 Cubans in America.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. Will the gentleman yield at this point?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. No. I do not yield. I know what the gentleman from New York is going to say. I am opposed to any form of racial intolerance, bigotry, or persecution such as exists in Germany. I am simply bringing that up to show that at our own doorsteps, where 200 or more of the best blood and foremost citizens of Cuba have been butchered in cold blood, whereas practically not a Jew has been killed in Germany, that not a single voice has been raised in America to protest, where we have a right and duty to do so, the appalling situation in Cuba.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I cannot yield. I do not have the time.

The same principle applies, of course, to Manchuria, as I pointed out. We have no duty to police Manchuria. We have no duty to send armed forces there or make finger noses at Japan, but we have a duty to say to this dictator Gerardo Machado in Cuba that terrorism must cease; that civil liberties must be restored; that the people of Cuba must be given the right to elect a president of their own choice. We do not need to send a single soldier there. Our political, economic, and financial influence, if properly exerted, is sufficient to secure the results desired.

The American people own and control three quarters of the property of Cuba; three quarters of the wealth of Cuba. We have $1,500,000,000 invested in Cuba, whereas we do not own more than a few million dollars of property in Manchuria, and much less in Germany than in Cuba. We own three quarters of the sugar plantations, the tobacco plantations, public utilities, railroads, banks, and actually three quarters of the wealth of Cuba. Our economic influence is tremendous, and in addition we have moral rights, geographical rights, and our obligations under the Platt amendment; yet we have not heard a protest regarding the anarchy in Cuba, where 2,000 of their citizens have been exiled, where 200 or more have been butchered and 2,000 more imprisoned, and where half a hundred college boys have been shot down on the streets of Habana in cold blood.

That is why I say to you, not that I want the Congress to act, because it is too late for the Congress to act, because if the American Government, through its Ambassador, does not act within the next 30 or 60 days, I am confident that the liberty-loving Cuban people will act themselves, because they cannot endure any longer the tyranny and bloodshed and atrocities which exist in their own country.

I want to read a resolution which I introduced on March 15. I am not pressing for its passage, either, because I want to give the Democratic Party fair and ample opportunity and time to work out a solution for the best interests of the Cuban people and our own people, which I think they are perfectly competent to do. If there is to be any investigation by Congress into the affairs of the Chase National Bank, it would be very interesting to ascertain the facts concerning the investments of that institution in Cuba and the amount of influence it wields on the Cuban Government and the maintenance of the Machado dictatorship.

At the same time I want the American people back home to know the facts about the fratricidal war being waged in Cuba which is ruinous to that country. The entire political and economic stability of Cuba is in peril. What a travesty on our war to free Cuba! Is it not time for the United States to offer to mediate and to insist on a restoration of the civil rights and liberties of the Cuban people? Anything less, in view of the tragic circumstances, would not be keeping faith with our moral and treaty obligations under the Platt amendment. The resolution which I have introduced is as follows:

House Concurrent Resolution 4

Whereas the Republic of Cuba has been governed during the past few years by a military dictatorship, based on fear, force, and violence; and

Whereas the liberties of the Cuban people, guaranteed by the United States through the Platt amendment, have been suppressed and all but destroyed; and

Whereas a large part of Cuba has been under martial law for various lengths of time; the University of Habana padlocked and schools closed; and

Whereas freedom of speech, freedom of the press and of assembly, and the right of habeas corpus have been suppressed or have virtually ceased to exist; and

Whereas numerous political opponents of the Machado dictatorship have been deported or forced to flee for their lives, and many others imprisoned; and

Whereas innumerable murders of political opponents, members of congress, editors of newspapers, and men prominent in the legal profession and all walks of life have occurred, either at the instigation of the existing government or through its connivance; and

Whereas a serious situation has developed in Cuba, because of the feeling of political desperation that has grown up against the despotic acts of the government among liberty-loving Cubans, whose independence was won through the combined efforts of Cubans and Americans at great sacrifice of lives and expenditure of money; and

Whereas the United States has the unquestioned right to intervene in order to maintain a government in Cuba, "adequate for the protection of life and property, and individual liberty", in accordance with the treaty of independence, containing the Platt amendment: Therefore be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That it is the sense of the Congress that the President of the United States exert his influence and extend to the Government and the people of the Republic of Cuba the good offices of the Government and its aid in bringing about a mutual understanding and amity among the various political factions, based on the restoration of the civil rights of the Cuban people, and the establishment of a government in Cuba "adequate for the protection of the lives, property, and individual liberty", as guaranteed by the Platt amendment.

[Applause.]

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. YOUNG].

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Chairman, as Congressman at large from the State of Ohio, representing nearly 7,000,000 citizens who have been compelled to make personal and financial sacrifices by reason of the economic disaster out of which I hope this country will soon emerge, I denounce Federal judges of my State and other States who have failed and are now refusing to voluntarily repay into the Treasury of the United States 15 percent of their salaries. [Applause.]

One of my first votes as a Member of Congress was to support the economy bill of the President of the United States, thereby reducing my salary and that of my colleagues from $10,000 to $8,500. Under authority granted by us, salaries of United States Senators, Cabinet members, Congressmen, and all Federal employees, from the highest to the lowest, except where a constitutional inhibition prevented, were cut.

We authorized this because the Nation was threatened with a crisis more serious than war. We did this to help meet a direful situation. We did this so that the Nation and all of our people might be led out of a wilderness of chaos and disaster into the promised land of contentment and economic security.

I denounce Federal judges of my State, and will name names and tell facts. They have refused to heed the demands of the times. They have been greedy and avaricious. The bailiffs who refer to them as the honorable court, and the scrubwomen who on hands and knees, in the darkness of night, clean their judicial offices so that they may in all dignity and smugness at 9:30 o'clock in the morning commence their judicial duties in immaculate surroundings, have had their pay cut. The scrubwoman, the bailiff, the elevator boy, all employees, each month and from now on as long as the need exists, regularly out of the small wage our Government pays them, make their contribution of 15 percent to bring contentment and economic security to all of our people.

Edmund Vance Cooke, the poet, wrote:

But to be a scrubwoman, with four Babies, or more,
Every day, every day, setting your back
On the rack,
And all your reward forever not quite
A full bite
Of bread for your babies. Say!
In the heat of the day
You might be a hero to head a brigade.
But a hero like her? I'm afraid! I'm afraid!

These judges, appointed for life, are secure in the knowledge that until they are 70 years old they may hold forth as judges at salaries of $10,000 and more. Upon attaining the age of 70 they no longer need appear in court and spend 4 or 5 hours on the bench, but by reason of the beneficence of our Government may retire at full pay and receive that full pay as long as they live.

Unfortunately, article III of the Constitution provides that the compensation of United States judges shall not be diminished during their continuance in office. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM] has rendered needful public service by introducing a resolution to amend the Constitution by striking out this inhibition. [Applause.] These judges, appointed for life, not responsible nor accountable to the people, demonstrate by their failure to voluntarily repay any part of their salary into the Treasury of the United States, that they regard themselves above a law which is being complied with by all other Federal officials and appointees from the highest to the lowest.

I say from the highest. Article II of the Constitution of the United States says that the compensation of the President may "neither be increased nor diminished during the period for which he shall have been elected." Nevertheless, President Franklin D. Roosevelt, as did President Herbert Hoover before him, voluntarily returned and is returning to the Treasury the same proportion of the presidential salary that other officials and employees of the United States were cut under the provisions of the Economy Act.

I denounce the Federal judges who have refused to voluntarily restore 15 percent of their salaries to the Treasury, and now demand that each forthwith voluntarily pay this percentage of his salary into the Treasury.

Section 7 of the Economy Act, which was enacted because the President stated our country was threatened with bankruptcy, is as follows:

In any case in which the application of the provisions of this act would result in the diminution of compensation prohibited by the Constitution, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to accept from such person and cover into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts remittance of such part of the compensation of such person as would not be paid to him if such diminution of compensation were not prohibited.

Here, Mr. Chairman and members of the Committee, is the list of dishonor. I now read the names of the Federal judges from Ohio who have refused to take pay cuts from their salaries: United States Judges Samuel H. West, Paul Jones, John H. Killits, George P. Hahn, Benson W. Hough, and Robert R. Nevin, salary $10,000 each; and United States Circuit Judge Smith Hickenlooper, salary $12,500.

The Temple of Delphi was scarcely more sacred to the ancient Greeks than the Federal judiciary is to many of our fellow citizens. As a lawyer I have lawsuits for clients pending in every court of my State—the Supreme Court of Ohio, the court of appeals, and the common-pleas court of my county, and in the United States court. I respect and admire just and honorable judges. In fact, my father was for more than 10 years a common-pleas judge in Ohio. What I say here, therefore, on my responsibility as representative of the people of my State, I say in a spirit of duty and not in a spirit of rancor.

It is a fact that Federal judges of our country have usurped powers and functions and have too frequently made a mockery of trial by jury. Federal judges have become not a group of public servants, but a group of public dictators and tyrants. Their present refusal in this emergency, when millions of men and women are unemployed and children are underfed, to accept the salary cut of 15 percent is simply further indication that these United States judges have the effrontery to deem themselves above the will of the people and in a class by themselves—and for themselves.

My investigation at the Department of Justice in regard to 151 United States judges and 40 United States circuit judges shows that only 3 have made remittances from their salaries to the Secretary of the Treasury. There are 3 patriotic, unselfish United States judges in the country, and 188 judicial hogs.

Mr. Chairman, there are two ways by which usurpation of dictatorship of the Federal courts of this country can be checked. Federal judges were not meant to be lawmakers, judges, and executioners all in one, and without responsibility to the people of our country. Usurpation of dictatorship by the Federal courts of our land will be checked either by direct election of Federal judges or by people taking the law into their own hands. Let us hope for the former method.

Let us also hope that an outraged public, and bar associations in meetings and newspapers in editorials, will call upon Federal judges to take the 15 percent cut that all others were compelled to take. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SHOEMAKER].

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Minnesota 5 minutes.

(Mr. SHOEMAKER asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD and include therein House Resolution No. 116.)

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is not a quorum present. I think this is going to be a good speech.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. McREYNOLDS). The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and ten gentlemen present, a quorum.

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has kept the House counted with a view to being able to state how many gentlemen are in the Chamber.

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Chairman, I have some rights in this matter, and they are not to be dealt with in this sort of way.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there can be no appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. BUSBY. I ask for tellers on the count of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state for the information of the Committee that the Chair has been sitting here counting the House, and has kept a memorandum of the number. There were 92 gentlemen in the House when the point was made, and some 15 or 20 have come in from the cloakroom since.

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers on the count of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. It is only necessary for the Chair to announce the number present.

Mr. BUSBY. I ask for tellers on the count of the Chair. Does the Chair refuse to proceed?

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order there can be no appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained, and the gentleman from Minnesota will proceed.

Mr. BUSBY. Very well.

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Mr. Chairman, we have just listened to a very interesting discourse on the Federal judges of the United States. We have also listened to some very interesting facts in regard to the Negro situation and communism. We also listened to some very interesting facts regarding the situation in Cuba and the Machado government.

I shall try to touch briefly on all three of these points.

First of all, I want to say that the farmers throughout the United States of America, and particularly in the western part of the United States, are today in what might be termed open revolt. Not only the depression has brought about this condition, but the decisions that have been handed down by the judiciary are largely responsible for the situation that exists throughout this country today, not only with regard to the Scottsboro and Crawford cases, but with regard to the property rights that have been so upheld by our judiciary system, while our great human rights have been trampled under foot, and I speak not as one who is inexperienced.

I speak as one who has gone through some of the tyranny and autocracy at the hands of Federal judges, and I wish at this time to bring to your attention the fact that I do not in any way sustain or uphold the action of these Iowa farmers in their conduct with regard to the judge out there the other day, but I do say that this thing can be amiably straightened out and handled out there if a little intelligence is applied to that situation, for these people, after all, are fighting for that one thing for which our fighting forefathers came to America, namely, to establish and maintain their homes. These people are fighting for homes, and this is the first instinct in the heart of a human breast.

I want to say that the decisions that have been handed down by our judiciary throughout the past have been decisions largely in the interest of the property class or of property rights, while human rights have been trampled under foot.

Mr. KENNEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHOEMAKER. I will, for a short question.

Mr. KENNEY. Has the gentleman asked for an investigation of our Federal courts?

Mr. SHOEMAKER. No; but it is very likely that he will.

I may say that the very judge who sentenced me to the penitentiary, not because he wanted to sentence me to the penitentiary—he did not want to sentence me to a penitentiary or to send me to jail. He gave me 1 year and 1 day, and then turned around to the court room and to me and said:

I do not believe, Mr. SHOEMAKER, that you are a criminal. However, I do not want to make a martyr out of you, and therefore I am going to suspend your prison sentence of 1 year and 1 day and place you upon probation for a period of 5 years in lieu thereof.

He himself said I was not a criminal. He himself, over his own signature, wrote a letter to the Department of Justice and to the Federal Parole Board and told them in one letter that I was in no sense the criminal type, and then turned around 2 weeks later and wrote another letter condemning me and calling me all kinds of names and saying that I was not liked in my own community, and that if I was paroled at all I should be paroled outside of the State of Minnesota, and in that case he would agree to it. In other words, I would be a good citizen, he said over his own signature, in some other State, but I would be a criminal if left at large in the State of Minnesota.

What was my crime? My crime was to help and try to assist in cleaning up the corrupt politicians in the State of Minnesota, if you please, and among them I am going to name a few for your approval.

There was F. B. Kellogg, to start with. Bill Mitchell, who deliberately beat the United States Government out of about $3,000,000 of Jim Hill's inheritance taxes, who was appointed Attorney General for being a good crook. G. A. Youngquist, the Attorney General of the State of Minnesota, who was within 6 weeks of the State penitentiary in the State of Minnesota and resigned as attorney general of the State and was appointed Assistant Attorney General of the United States. Arch Coleman, one of the authors of the infamous Brooks-Coleman Act of Minnesota, who was run out of the State and was made First Assistant Postmaster General. Pierce Butler was put on the Supreme Bench. Walter Newton was made Secretary to the President. Bill Schilling was put on the Farm Board. Thatcher, at $25,000, was put on the Grain Corporation. Akerson was taken off the Minneapolis Tribune and brought down here and made the official liar for the administration. [Laughter.]

They accused me of being behind the movement to get rid of these fellows in Minnesota, and they put them on the Federal pay roll down here. The stunt was to get rid of Shoemaker. They had to get rid of Shoemaker in any case, and I want to state to you that the banker I referred to as "robber of widows and orphans" was president of the State Bankers' Association, a schoolmate of the Federal judge, also a schoolmate of the brother of the Federal judge, a schoolmate of the then sitting Congressman in this House, who could not even let me alone when I was in the penitentiary but had to proceed to persecute me there.

I am going to read into the RECORD a confidential letter to the warden after they had me locked up in the penitentiary. It reads as follows:

RED WING, MINN., April 13, 1931.

Mr. T. B. WHITE,
Warden United States Penitentiary,
Leavenworth, Kans.

MY DEAR WARDEN WHITE: I wish to write you confidentially in regard to FRANCIS H. SHOEMAKER, who is now confined to your institution under sentence for 1 year and 1 day, imposed by Judge Sanborn, of Minnesota, for violation of the postal laws.

I have been informed by several parties who have heard from SHOEMAKER, to the effect that he has been feigning sickness upon several occasions since he arrived at the institution.

I have investigated as to his past conduct and have learned that he is in the habit of complaining of sickness every time the Government has placed some requirements upon him. I am, therefore, convinced that he has been feigning sickness at your institution in order to get away from work, as required by your regulations.

This matter is being called to your attention at this time, as I understand that the prisoner has made application for parole, which will be considered at the next meeting of the Board.

When this man is not confined to a prison he is the most active and vigorous animal, and is on the go by day and night, preaching his radical doctrines in order to "hoodwink" the ignorant into contributing money and support to his cause.

I would appreciate very much if you will cause an investigation to be made as to the alleged sickness of this man, and let me know as to your findings, since I am interested to learn something about this man's record while he is confined at your institution.

With kindest personal regards, I am,

AUGUST H. ANDRESEN,
Congressman Third District, Minnesota.

Now, what business is it of the Congressman to tell the warden down there what to do. I do not think there is any man in this Congress—I am assuming that—that would take on himself that authority. It may be of interest to you to have the confidential answer that the Congressman got to his letter. It is from the warden, and reads as follows:

UNITED STATES PENITENTIARY,
Leavenworth, Kans., April 19, 1931.

Hon. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN,
Red Wing, Minn.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: I am in receipt of your letter of April 13, 1931, inquiring into the health of our FRANCIS H. SHOEMAKER, registration no. 38163.

Mr. SHOEMAKER was received here February 1, 1931, and will be eligible for parole on April 29, 1931.

In a report from our prison assistant physician, Dr. K. E. Conklin, I find this paragraph: "His (SHOEMAKER's) physical condition is good and is not giving him a bit of trouble; he states himself that he is not sick."

SHOEMAKER's record since he has been here is good, as I find no reports for violation of rules against him.

Thanking you for the information and your interest in the matter, I am,

Very truly yours,

F. L. MORRISON, Acting Warden.

I had to be called in about every week and have a physical examination because the Congressman wanted it. [Laughter.] He was so interested in my welfare and hoped that I might die while there.

This tyrannical judge who sentenced me was instrumental in the passage of the Brooks-Coleman Act, which gave the railroad and warehouse commission the right to make rates on street-car lines in Duluth and the Twin Cities. When they had the power they raised the fare from 5 cents to 10 cents, taking that amount out of the dinner pails of those who ride on the street-car lines.

Now, I have here a photograph of four people, a father and mother and two children, who have been harangued and murdered and driven to suicide by the despotic, tyrannical rule over the people of Minnesota. Here it is. Look at that picture of a father and mother and two children. Last week they were harangued and driven to suicide simply because the woman refused on the jury to give the judge a conviction on the case of W. B. Foshay.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHOEMAKER. I will yield for a short question.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Is this judge still on the bench?

Mr. SHOEMAKER. He has been promoted to the circuit court of appeals.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. The gentleman has stated enough facts; why does not he introduce a resolution to impeach him?

Mr. SHOEMAKER. He is the judge who sentenced me.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Does not the gentleman think the Judiciary Committee would give consideration to these facts?

Mr. SHOEMAKER. I should be very glad to submit to the Committee on the Judiciary any such evidence they may desire. Mrs. Genevieve Clark was on the jury and was asked whether she knew W. B. Foshay, the defendant. She said she did not know him. She voted to acquit Foshay. Several weeks after the jury disagreed they sent out their bunch of snoopers and espionage agents and found that at some time previously, several years before, this poor woman had worked for 2 weeks along with two or three hundred other women who were hired especially to address some envelopes containing advertising matter that was being sent out. She told the truth when she said she did not know Foshay. I have talked with this woman since.

They claimed that because she worked for Foshay she should have volunteered that information, and they brought her up for contempt of court and sentenced her to 6 months and $1,000 fine. The case finally went to the circuit court of appeals. That court upheld the sentence, but cut off the fine. For over a year this woman has spent every penny that she could get. Their family means were depleted. She was to give herself up last week to the Federal marshal in the State of Minnesota, but rather than face the disgrace of going to prison, rather than have the family face the disgrace of having their mother in the penitentiary, the family put the garden hose on the exhaust pipe of their automobile and drove out into the country and turned on the motor, and turned the exhaust into the car, and there is the picture of the four in the family who died at one time as a result of the manipulations and machinations of a Federal court that is supposed to dispense justice in this great land of ours. I say to you the time has come to call a halt on this proposition.

Now, with regard to the speech just made by our worthy colleague, HAMILTON FISH, of New York, regarding the Cuban situation, I wish to emphatically state that I am not here either to condemn or defend the Machado government of Cuba, but I do happen to know that in this country there are at work revolutionary forces who are conniving daily for the sole and specific reason of fomenting an armed intervention of the Cuban Government through the activities of these revolutionists. I have been informed that several armories located in several Southern States have been completely depleted of their arms and ammunition which have been stolen and taken to Cuba for the purpose of fostering and bringing about a revolution. As I understand the situation, the entire Cuban situation resolves itself into a battle of two huge financial groups in the United States of America who are striving to gain control of the natural resources of Cuba. With one group backing the present Machado regime and the other group backing and financing the revolutionists, and in neither case are civil rights considered nor is the welfare of the Cuban people given any thought, and for that reason I wish to insert into the RECORD at this time a resolution which I introduced into this House on April 21, and which was referred to the Committee on Rules. The resolution reads as follows:

Whereas it is of record in the courts of Atlantic County, N.J., that certain underworld characters and Cuban conspirators were heading an expedition to Cuba for the purpose of carrying on a revolution against the government of President Machado, the duly constituted and constitutional authority of the Republic of Cuba, were apprehended and their arms and ammunition were destroyed by New York and New Jersey police officials; and

Whereas Dr. Miguel Gomez, formerly mayor of Habana, Cuba, is now in New York the avowed and acknowledged leader of the revolutionary forces attempting to overthrow the duly constituted government of President Machado; and

Whereas those so-called "political refugees", masking under the guise of exiles, are forming societies and collecting funds to carry on the revolutionary movement, this activity being more particularly evidenced by a widely heralded meeting held in Miami, Fla., on March 22, 1933, at which the following officers were elected: Dr. Carlos De La Torre, president; Dr. Roberto Mendez Penate, vice president; and Louis Barraras, secretary; and among those attending this meeting of revolutionary conspirators were Dr. Gomez, Dr. Juan Espinosa, Carlos Pelaez, Mario G. Menocal, Dr. Pedro Martinez Fraga, Dr. Santiago Verdeja, Dr. Raymon Grau San Martin, Dr. Recordo Dolz, Guillermo Barrientos, Dr. Carlos Mendieta, and Dr. Aurelio Hevia. In addition, the meeting was attended by Dr. Carlos Saladrigas, a known member of the A.B.C. secret society. Immediately after the adjournment of this meeting Dr. Miguel Gomez left for New York to initiate and take charge of the revolutionary movement there aimed at the duly constituted and functioning administration of President Machado, of the Republic of Cuba; and

Whereas it is becoming evident and of current knowledge that those revolutionary activities are being fostered and financed by agents of a foreign power not over friendly to the Government of the United States, for the purpose of distracting public attention from contemplated movements of their own; and

Whereas these activities have a tendency to embarrass the Government of the United States and are against the peace and dignity of the Government of the United States, being contrary and in open violation of its laws and treaties, as well as the laws of its sovereign States: Therefore be it

Resolved, That a committee of five Members of the House of Representatives be appointed to investigate the unlawful and secret plottings of the several revolutionary organizations or individuals who are now enjoying the asylum and sanctuary of the Government of the United States.

SEC. 2. The committee, or any authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized and directed to sit and act at such times and places as may be necessary, to hold hearings and conduct investigations of the revolutionary activities particularly referred to in this resolution.

Sec. 3. The committee is empowered to subpoena persons, records, documents, minutes of meetings, summon and swear witnesses, and to secure data on any or all information, as may be deemed necessary to aid the committee in the ascertainment of the facts, particular attention to be directed to the laxity of the various executive and judicial departments in enforcing the provisions of the Constitution, the treaties and laws of the United States relative to the suppression of the herein-named revolutionary activities.

Sec. 4. The committee shall report to Congress before the adjournment of the special session now pending all findings that they may have determined at that time, a final report to be made on the first day of the first regular session of the Seventy-third Congress, the final report to contain the complete results and findings of its investigations, together with such recommendations for legislation as it shall deem advisable. When its report is led as provided the committee shall cease to exist.

My aim in introducing this resolution, and the purpose that I hope it will accomplish, is that in case investigation is to be made of Cuba that it be a thorough investigation, investigating all parties concerned in the controversy.

The CHAIRMAN. The time for the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I yield 6 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLMER].

Mr. GOSS. I yield the gentleman 4 minutes.

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Chairman and members of the Committee, I believe my record here up to this time will bear out the fact that I have not bored this House with any long-winded or unnecessary speeches, and I regret keenly today that I feel it necessary to rise to answer the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] who made a speech here a few moments ago with reference to the racial question, with particular reference to the Scottsboro, Ala., and Virginia (Crawford) cases. I regret that the gentleman saw fit to make his speech, and I regret the necessity, as I view it, for answering his effort. While this country is in the midst of the most hectic days it has ever witnessed, in the greatest crisis in its history, when a great and substantial piece of legislation affecting the economic situation of the Nation is being considered, I do not think, nor do I believe a majority of the membership think, that this is a proper time to bring up a question of that kind. If there ever was a time when we need a unified, patriotic American citizenship to try to save this country for posterity, that time is now. I do not believe this is any time to wave the red flag of racial prejudice or to introduce such a subject before this House. I am at a loss to understand why the gentleman should have seen fit, in the consideration of this important piece of legislation, to inject into the discussion a matter that is entirely foreign. What good purpose is to be served thereby? I asked the gentleman from New York repeatedly to yield to me in order that I might ask some very pointed questions. I was unsuccessful in that, and I think I am justified, therefore, in making this brief reply. What does the gentleman from New York hope to accomplish by discussing a case that is being tried in the courts of the sovereign State of Alabama (the Scottsboro case)?

Does the gentleman hope to influence the jury that will try that case? Does the gentleman hope to influence the judge in granting his instructions to the jury that will try that case? Did the gentleman hope to stop this communism, to which he referred, by advertising in the newspapers of the land what he considers an injustice, and about which he says he knows no more than Will Rogers knows by reading it in the newspapers?

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLMER. Since the gentleman from that side did not see fit to yield to me, I decline to yield.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I am a new Member and I will move to the other side if that will help.

Mr. COLMER. That would not help at all. Mr. Chairman, it so happens that I had been a prosecuting attorney for some 12 years immediately prior to coming to this House. I think I know something about the laws and the practice and the procedure in the trial of these cases. I do not rise here now to defend the administration of justice in the States of Alabama, Virginia, or Mississippi, but I say to the gentleman from New York that if a Negro is being tried in a court in Mississippi, that Negro does receive fair treatment at the hands of the court and of the jury. Further, in my practice as a prosecuting attorney, and I say this seriously and truthfully, a poor defenseless Negro, when brought into the court in which I practiced and where I had to prosecute him, received more consideration at my hands, more favorable consideration, if you please, than did many white men who were guilty of some serious offense with able counsel and means to defend them, because we recognized the fact that he was poor and defenseless.

Mr. LEE of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLMER. Since I have refused to yield over here, I wish the gentleman would let me finish.

Mr. LEE of Missouri. I do not blame the gentleman.

Mr. COLMER. Oh, very well; I yield.

Mr. LEE of Missouri. I ask the gentleman if such speeches of Mr. FISH do not tend to cause a lot of Negroes to get in trouble who ought to be good Negroes, like we have them conduct themselves in our country?

Mr. COLMER. I will say to the gentleman that I was just coming to that point. I understand the gentleman from New York is a lawyer. I may be misinformed about that. I assume that if he is a lawyer, he is an able lawyer, as he is an able speaker, but I say to the gentleman, if he is a lawyer, then he knows that no good purpose could be served by such speeches as this and by waving the red flag of sectionalism and race. There can be no good purpose served by this. These men are to be tried by the courts of a sovereign State, and what the gentleman from New York thinks about it is immaterial; just as immaterial as it may be what I might think about a case that was being tried in the sovereign State of New York. I want to appeal to the patriotism of the gentleman and those who live north of the line and who reside temporarily here in the House on the other side of the aisle, that if you want to help the Negro, this is not the way to do it, as the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LEE] has suggested.

I recall reading that about a year ago the distinguished gentleman from the State of New York [Mr. FISH] started out on some kind of an investigating committee. I do not know what that cost the taxpayers of America, but I do recall that they went to the principal cities of the United States. They stopped in the finest hotels. They were looking for what? Looking for Communists. I am informed that on one occasion they actually surrounded a warehouse over at Baltimore. They called for the detectives and the police. They threatened to call for the Army, and perhaps the marines, and when they got down there and surrounded it, what did they find? A few crates of rotten cabbage. [Laughter and applause.]

I can see my distinguished friend from New York now in one of these fine hotels with all the luxuries surrounding him; I can see him down there with a flashlight looking under the bed and looking under the chairs and all the furnishings in the hotel, looking for Communists [laughter and applause], while, as a matter of fact, the conduct of the Government under the regime of the party to which the gentleman from New York belongs was making more Communists every day than has ever been known in this country, just as the distinguished gentleman's conduct today is calculated to encourage communism and discontent in the land.

But my purpose in arising is not to condemn the distinguished gentleman from New York no more than it is now my purpose to appeal to sectionalism or racial superiority. My appeal in this hour of need, in this hour of distress, in this hour of crisis, is to patriotism and to common sense. And may I not express the hope in conclusion that, at least during the crisis of the country, misguided Members of the House as well as the citizens generally will refrain from injecting such highly controversial issues into consideration either in the House or in the country? If there ever was a time in the history of the country when the Nation needed the united, whole-hearted, fervent, patriotic cooperation of its citizens of all races, that time is here now. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLMER] has expired.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time, 20 minutes, to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN].

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, the United States is bankrupt. It has been bankrupted by the corrupt and dishonest Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Reserve banks. It has repudiated its debt to its own citizens. Its chief foreign creditor is Great Britain, and a British bailiff has been at the White House and British agents are in the United States Treasury making inventories and arranging terms of liquidation. In close cooperation with the British bailiff a French bailiff has been standing by with a staff of experts and 25 of the leading French journalists. The "united front" has arrived at Washington.

Mr. Chairman, the Federal Reserve Board has offered to collect the British claims in full from the American public by trickery and corruption, if Great Britain will help it to conceal its crimes. The British are shielding their agents, the Federal Reserve System, because they do not wish that system of robbery destroyed here. They wish it to continue for their benefit. By means of it Great Britain has become the financial mistress of the world. She has regained the position she occupied before the World War. For several years she has been a silent partner in the business of the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Reserve banks. Under threats of blackmail, or by bribery, or by their native treachery to the people of the United States, the officials in charge of the Federal Reserve banks unwisely gave Great Britain immense gold loans of our national-bank depositors' money. They did this against the law. They gave England gold loans running into hundreds of millions of dollars. Those gold loans were not single transactions. They were revolving loans. They gave Great Britain a borrowing power in the United States of billions. She squeezed billions out of this country by means of her control of the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Reserve banks. As soon as the Hoover moratorium was announced—and it was Great Britain who instructed Hoover how to declare it—Great Britain moved to consolidate her gains. After the treacherous signing away of American rights at the 7-power conference at London in July 1931 which put the Federal Reserve System under the control of the Bank for International Settlements, Great Britain began to tighten the hangman's noose around the neck of the United States. She abandoned the gold standard and embarked upon a campaign of buying up the claims of foreigners against the Federal Reserve banks in all parts of the world. She has now sent her bailiff, Ramsay MacDonald, here to get her war debt to this country canceled. She has a club in her hand. She has title to the gambling debts which the corrupt and dishonest Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Reserve banks incurred abroad. Ramsay MacDonald, the Labor Party deserter, has come here to compel the President to sign on the dotted line and that is what Roosevelt is about to do. Roosevelt will endeavor to conceal the nature of his action from the American people. But he will obey the international bankers and transfer the war debt that Great Britain should pay to the American people, to the shoulders of the American taxpayers.

Mr. Chairman, the bank holidays in the several States were brought about by the corrupt and dishonest Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Reserve banks. Those institutions manipulated money and credit and caused the States to order bank holidays. Those holidays were "frame-ups." They were dress rehearsals for the national bank holiday which Franklin D. Roosevelt promised Sir Ronald Lindsay that he would declare. There was no national emergency here when Roosevelt took office except the bankruptcy of the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Reserve banks—a bankruptcy which has been going on under cover for several years and which has been concealed from the people so that the people would continue to permit their bank deposits and their bank reserves and their gold and the funds of the United States Treasury to be impounded in the bankrupt institutions. Under cover, the predatory international bankers have been stealthily transferring the burden of the Federal Reserve debts to the people's Treasury and to the people themselves. They have been using the farms and the homes of the United States to pay for their thievery. That is the only national emergency there has been here since the depression began. Someone asked Mr. Ogden Mills what caused the depression. He answered quite truthfully, "The Federal Reserve lent so much money abroad that it broke down the System." Mr. Chairman, those who have lost everything they possessed through the evil practices of the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Reserve banks should at least be told the truth about how it happened. The veterans of the World War should know that the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Reserve banks paid the dole in England, and are still paying it, and that that is the reason why the resident agents of England in this country have cut the pensions of the United States soldiers $400,000,000 a year.

The week before the bank holiday was declared in New York State the deposits in New York savings banks were greater than the withdrawals. There were no runs on New York banks. There was no need of a bank holiday in New York or of a national holiday. Roosevelt did what the international bankers ordered him to do. When Sir Ronald Lindsay was at Warm Springs, Ga., when Franklin D. Roosevelt violated the Logan Act, the obnoxious Lindsay was promised that the United States would be taken off the gold standard "without debate" and "by surprise" and that was what England wanted and was insisting upon. Sir Ronald Lindsay hotfooted it to London to tell the good news to the English Cabinet. They did not trust the mail or their favorite instrument, the transatlantic telephone. Do not deceive yourself, Mr. Chairman, or permit yourself to be deceived by others into the belief that Roosevelt's dictatorship is in any way intended to benefit the people of the United States. He is preparing to sign on the dotted line. He is preparing to cancel the war debts by fraud. He is preparing to internationalize this country and to destroy our Constitution itself in order to keep the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Reserve banks intact as a money-making institution for foreigners.

Mr. Chairman, I have received an inquiry from one of my constituents in regard to his right to have gold and gold tickets, silver and silver certificates, and all other forms of coin and currency issued by the United States Government in his personal possession or in the possession of his agents. Mr. Chairman, I have informed my constituent that he has a constitutional right to have gold and silver in his possession, either in the form of bullion or of coins, and that he has a right to have United States currency of every description in his possession, and that his right to hold such private property is absolute and that such private property may not be taken away from him without due process of law.

Mr. Chairman, I see no reason why citizens of the United States should be terrorized into surrendering their property to the international bankers who own and control the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Reserve banks. The statement that gold would be taken from its lawful owners if they did not voluntarily surrender it to private interests shows that there is an anarchist in the Government. The statement that it is necessary for the people to give their gold—the only real money—to the banks in order to protect the currency is a statement of calculated dishonesty.

By his unlawful usurpation of power on the night of March 5, 1933, and by his proclamation, which in my opinion was in violation of the Constitution of the United States, Roosevelt divorced the currency of the United States from gold, and United States currency is no longer protected by gold. It is, therefore, sheer dishonesty to say that the people's gold is needed to protect the currency. Roosevelt ordered the people to give their gold to private interests—that is, to banks—and he took control of the banks, so that all the gold and gold values in them or given into them might be handed over to the predatory international bankers who own and control the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Reserve banks. Roosevelt cast in his lot with the usurers. He agreed to save the corrupt and dishonest Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Reserve banks at the expense of the people of the United States. He took advantage of the people's confusion and weariness and spread a dragnet over the United States to capture everything of value that was left in it. He made a great haul for the international bankers.

Mr. Chairman, the terms of Roosevelt's surrender were arranged between himself, certain international bankers, and Sir Ronald Lindsay. A British paper has lately said that Roosevelt refrained from accepting responsibility before he acquired authority in all matters except the matter of the war debts. So you see, Mr. Chairman, before entering the Presidency he took up the matter of the war debts. He violated the terms of the Logan Act.

Mr. Chairman, statements in the newspapers to the effect that the conferences now taking place are mere academic and preparatory discussions between officials of the United States Government and representatives of foreign nations are false. The Prime Minister of England came here for money. He came here to collect cash. He came here with Federal Reserve currency and other claims against the Federal Reserve System which England has bought up in all parts of the world and he has presented them for redemption in gold.

Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of compelling the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Reserve banks to pay their own debts. I see no reason why the general public should be forced to pay the gambling debts of the international bankers.

By his action in closing the banks of the United States, Roosevelt seized the gold value of the forty billions and more of bank deposits in the United States banks. Those deposits were deposits of gold values. By his action he has rendered them payable to the depositors in paper money only, if payable at all, and the paper money he proposes to pay out to bank depositors and to the people generally in lieu of their hard-earned gold values is of no intrinsic value in itself and, being based on nothing into which the people can convert it, the said paper money is of negligible value altogether. It is paper money which is not convertible into gold or silver. It is the money of slaves, not of free men. If the people of the United States permit it to be imposed upon them at the will of the credit masters, the next step in their downward progress will be their acceptance of orders on company stores for what they eat and wear. Their case will be similar to that of starving coal miners. They, too, will be paid with orders on company stores for food and clothing, both of indifferent quality, and be forced to live in company-owned houses, from which they may be evicted at the drop of the hat. More of them will be forced into conscript labor camps under military supervision.

At noon on the 4th of March 1933 Franklin Delano Roosevelt, with his hand on the Bible, took an oath to preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States. At midnight on the 5th of March 1933 he confiscated the property of American citizens. He took the currency of the United States off the gold standard of value. He repudiated the internal debt of the Government to its own citizens. He destroyed the value of the American dollar. He released, or endeavored to release, the Federal Reserve banks from their contractual liability to redeem Federal Reserve currency in gold or lawful money on a parity with gold. He depreciated the value of the national currency. The people of the United States are now using irredeemable paper slips for money. The Treasury cannot redeem that paper in gold or silver. The gold and silver of the Treasury has unlawfully been given to the corrupt and dishonest Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Reserve banks. And the administration has since had the effrontery to raid the country for more gold for the private interests by telling our patriotic citizens that their gold is needed to protect the currency. It is not being used to protect the currency. It is being used to protect the corrupt and dishonest Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Reserve banks. The directors of those institutions have committed criminal offenses against the United States Government, including the offense of making false entries on their books and the still more serious offense of unlawfully abstracting funds from the United States Treasury. Roosevelt's gold raid is intended to help them out of the pit they dug for themselves when they gambled away the wealth and savings of the American people.

The international bankers set up a dictatorship here because they wanted a dictator who would protect them. They wanted a dictator who would issue a proclamation giving the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Reserve banks an absolute and unconditional release from their contractual liability to redeem their special currency in gold or lawful money at any Federal Reserve bank. Has Roosevelt released any other class of debtors in this country from the necessity of paying their debts? Has he made a proclamation telling the farmers that they need not pay their mortgages? Has he made a proclamation to the effect that mothers of starving children need not pay their milk bills? Has he made a proclamation relieving householders from the necessity of paying rent? Not he. He has issued one kind of proclamation only, and that is a proclamation to relieve international bankers and the foreign debtors of the United States Government.

Mr. Chairman, the gold in the banks of this country belongs to the American people, who have paper money contracts for it in the form of national currency. If the Federal Reserve banks cannot keep their contracts with United States citizens to redeem their paper money in gold or lawful money, then the Federal Reserve banks must be taken over by the United States Government and their officers must be put on trial. There must be a day of reckoning. If the Federal Reserve banks have looted the Treasury, so that the Treasury cannot redeem the United States currency for which it is liable in gold, then the Federal Reserve banks must be driven out of the Treasury.

Mr. Chairman, a gold certificate is a warehouse receipt for gold in the Treasury, and the man who has a gold certificate is the actual owner of a corresponding amount of gold stored in the Treasury and subject to his order. As Charles N. Fowler, a former Member of this House, said when he was Chairman of the House Banking and Currency Committee, "A gold certificate is its own redeemer."

Now comes Roosevelt, who seeks to render the money of the United States worthless by unlawfully proclaiming that it may not be converted into gold at the will of the holder.

When Daniel Webster was in the Senate, he said, with rugged honesty:

I profess to be a bullionist in the usual and accepted sense of that word. I am for a specie basis for our circulation and for specie as a part of the circulation so far as it may be practicable and convenient. I am for giving no value to paper merely as paper. I abhor paper; that is to say, irredeemable paper—paper that may not be converted into gold and silver at the will of the holder.

This House and this Government should stay where God put them. We should maintain our intellectual honesty and our dignity. We should be able at all times to say with Webster:

I am where I have been, and ever mean to be, standing on the platform of the Constitution—a platform broad enough and firm enough to uphold every interest of the whole country.

Roosevelt's next haul for the international bankers was a reduction in the pay of all Federal employees. The poor clerk in a Government office is compelled to give up 15 percent of his salary while the international bankers are presented with all the gold in the country. Next in order are the veterans of all wars, many of whom are aged and infirm and others sick and disabled. Those men had their lives adjusted for them by acts of Congress determining the amount of their pensions, and, while it is meet that every citizen should sacrifice himself for the good of the United States, I see no reason why these poor people, these aged Civil War veterans, and war widows, and half-starved veterans of the World War should be compelled to give up their pensions for the financial benefit of the international vultures who have looted the Treasury, bankrupted the country, and traitorously delivered the United States to a foreign foe. There are many ways of raising revenue that are better than this barbarous act of injustice. Why not collect from the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Reserve banks the amount they owe to the United States Treasury in interest on all the Federal Reserve currency they have taken from the United States Government? That would put billions of dollars into the United States Treasury. If Franklin D. Roosevelt is as honest as he pretends to be he will have that done immediately. And, in addition, why not compel the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Reserve banks to disclose their profits and to pay the Government its share? Until that is done, it is rank dishonesty to talk of maintaining the credit of the United States Government.

The Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Reserve banks have stolen the income taxes and other taxes paid into the United States Treasury by Federal employees, and because that money and other public funds have been stolen by them and the United States Treasury is bankrupt, the Government clerk is told, "Yes; we know you paid your income tax, but the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Reserve banks took your money out of the United States Treasury and treated it as their own and they have it where Uncle Sam cannot get it, so you, poor creature, must let your salary be reduced by 15 percent."

Mr. Chairman, the salaries of Members of Congress may not be changed during the lifetime of the Congress in which the Members participate. Nevertheless the salaries of Members have been reduced. I object to this on constitutional grounds.

Mr. Chairman, my own salary as a Member of Congress has been reduced, and while I am willing to give the part of it that has been taken away from me to the United States Government, I regret that the United States has suffered itself to be brought so low by the vultures and crooks who are operating the roulette wheels and faro tables in the Federal Reserve banks that it is now obliged to throw itself on the mercy of its own legislators and charwomen, its clerks, and its poor old pensioners, and to take money out of our pockets to make good the defalcations of the international bankers who were placed in control of the Treasury and given a monopoly of United States currency by the misbegotten Federal Reserve Act.

Mr. Chairman, I am well aware that the international bankers who drive up to the door of the United States Treasury in their limousines look down with scorn upon Members of Congress because we work for so little, while they draw millions a year. The difference is that we earn or try to earn what we get and they steal the greater part of their takings.

Mr. Chairman, I do not like to see vivisections performed on human beings. I do not like to see the American people used for experimental purposes by the credit masters of the United States. They predicted among themselves that they would be able to produce a condition here in which American citizens would be completely humbled and left starving and penniless in the streets. The fact that they made that assertion while they were fomenting their conspiracy against the United States shows that they like to see a human being, especially an American, stumbling from hunger as he walks. Something should be done about it, they say; 5-cent meals or something! But Franklin Delano Roosevelt will not permit the House of Representatives to investigate the condition of the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Reserve banks. Franklin D. Roosevelt will not do that. He has certain international bankers to serve. They now look to him as the man higher up who will protect them from the just wrath of an outraged people.

Mr. Chairman, the international bankers have always hated our pensioners. A man with a small pension is a ward of the Government. He is not dependent upon them for a salary or wages. They cannot control him. They do not like him. It gave them great pleasure, therefore, to slash the veterans. The veterans are counted upon to make up $400,000,000 a year to pay for the defalcations of the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Reserve banks. The plutocrats who own and operate those un-American institutions have their gold safely bestowed, while the American people have a huge deficit in their Treasury. But Franklin D. Roosevelt will never do anything to embarrass his financial supporters. He will cover up the crimes of the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Reserve banks.

Before he was elected, Mr. Roosevelt advocated a return to the earlier practices of the Federal Reserve System, thus admitting its corruptness. The Democratic platform advocated a change in the personnel of the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Reserve banks. Those remarks were campaign bait. As a prominent Democrat lately remarked to me—and he is not very far away from where I am standing at the present moment—"There is no new deal. The same old crowd is in control."

Mr. Chairman, the claims of the foreign creditors of the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Reserve banks have no validity in law. The foreign creditors were the receivers—and the willing receivers—of stolen goods. They have received through their banking fences immense amounts of currency, and that currency was unlawfully taken from the United States Treasury by the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Reserve banks. England discovered the irregularities of the Federal Reserve System quite early in its operation and through fear, apparently, the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Reserve banks have, for years, suffered themselves to be blackmailed and dragooned into permitting England to share in the business of the Federal Reserve banks.

The Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Reserve banks have unlawfully taken many billions of dollars of the public credit of the United States and have given it to foreign sellers on the security of the debt paper of foreign buyers in purely foreign transactions, and when the foreign buyers refused to meet their obligations and the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Reserve banks saw no honest way of getting the stolen funds back into their own possession, they decided by control of the Executive to make the American people pay their losses. They likewise entered into a conspiracy to deprive the people of the United States of their title to the war debts and, not being able to do that in the way they intended, they are now engaged in an effort to debase the American dollar so that foreign governments will have their debts to this country cut in two and then by means of other vicious underhanded arrangements, they propose to remit the remainder.

Mr. Chairman, I am of the opinion that England should be left to secure redress from the original welchers on the gambling debts of the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Reserve banks. Failing that, let her look to the international bankers who undertook to finance the world—at a price—with the funds they stole from the United States Treasury.

So far as the United States Treasury is concerned, the gambling counters have no legal standing. The United States Treasury cannot be compelled to make good the gambling ventures of the corrupt and dishonest Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Reserve banks. Still less should the bank deposits of the American people be used for that purpose. Still less should the national currency have been made irredeemable in gold so that the gold which was massed and stored to redeem the currency for American citizens may be used to pay the gambling debts of the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Reserve banks for England's benefit. The American people should have their gold in their own possession, where it cannot be held under secret agreement for any foreign central bank or world bank or foreign nation. Our own citizens have the prior claim to it. The paper money they have in their possession deserves redemption far more than the United States currency and credit which were stolen from the United States Treasury and bootlegged abroad. Why should foreigners be made preferred creditors of the bankrupt United States? Why should the United States be treated as a bankrupt? This Government has assets. This Government has immense sums due to it from the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Reserve banks. The directors of those institutions are men of great wealth. Why should the guilty escape the consequences of their misdeeds? Why should the people of the United States surrender the gold value of their bank deposits and the gold value of their currency to pay the gambling debts of the bankers? Why should Roosevelt promise foreigners that the United States will play the part of a good neighbor "meeting its obligations"? Let the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Reserve banks meet their own obligations.

Every member of the Federal Reserve Board and every Federal Reserve bank director should be compelled to disgorge, and every acceptance banker and every discount corporation which has made illegal profits by means of public credit unlawfully bootlegged out of the United States Treasury and hired out by the crooks and vultures of the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Reserve banks should be compelled to disgorge. After the disgorgement, if the amount of the contributions is not sufficient to pay the gambling debts of the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Reserve banks, then let there be a capital levy to pay them. Yes, Mr. Chairman, if those gambling debts must be paid, let them be paid by a capital levy so that the corporations which profited by the international bankers' exploits shall be the ones who pay the international bankers' gambling debts. Gambling debts due to foreign receivers of stolen goods should not be paid by sacrificing our title to the war debts, the assets of the United States Treasury, which belong to all the people of the United States and which it is our duty to preserve inviolate in the people's Treasury. The United States Treasury cannot be made liable for them. Federal Reserve currency must be redeemed by the Federal Reserve banks or else the Federal Reserve banks must be liquidated.

Mr. Chairman, we know from assertions made here by the Honorable John N. Garner, the present Vice President of the United States, that there is a condition in the United States Treasury which would cause American citizens, if they knew what it was, to lose all confidence in their Government. That is a condition which Roosevelt will not have investigated. He has brought with him from Wall Street James Warburg, the son of Paul M. Warburg. Mr. Warburg is the head of the Bank of Manhattan Co. Mr. Warburg, alien born and the son of an alien who did not become naturalized here until several years after this Warburg's birth, is a son of a former partner of Kuhn, Loeb & Co., a grandson of another partner, a nephew of a former partner, and a nephew of a present partner. He holds no office in our Government, but I am told that he is in daily attendance at the Treasury, and that he has private quarters there. In other words, Mr. Chairman, Kuhn, Loeb & Co. now control and occupy the United States Treasury.

Mr. Chairman, the text of the Executive order which seems to place an embargo on shipments of gold permits the Secretary of the Treasury, a former director of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York, the practices of which have been corrupt, to issue licenses in his discretion for the export of gold coin, or bullion, earmarked or held in trust for a recognized foreign government or foreign central bank, or for the Bank for International Settlements. Now, Mr. Chairman, if gold held in trust for those foreign institutions may be sent to them, I see no reason why gold held in trust for American citizens as evidenced by their gold certificates and other currency issued by the United States Government should not be paid to them. I think an American citizen is entitled to treatment at least as good as that which the present administration is extending to foreign governments, foreign central banks, and the Bank for International Settlements. I think a veteran of the World War with a $20 gold certificate is at least as much entitled to receive his own gold for it as any international banker in the city of New York or London.

Mr. Chairman, by the terms of the same Executive order, which seems to place an embargo on shipments of gold, the Secretary of the Treasury, in his discretion, may issue licenses authorizing the export of gold coin or bullion imported for reexport of gold in reasonable amounts for usual trade requirements of refiners importing gold-bearing materials under agreement to export gold. This, Mr. Chairman, would permit foreign nations who hold our gold coins to send them here and have them melted down for reshipment back to Europe.

Again, Mr. Chairman, by the terms of the Executive order, gold may be exported if it is actually required for the fulfillment of any contract entered into prior to the date of this order by an applicant who, in obedience to the Executive order of April 5, 1933, has delivered gold coin, gold bullion, or gold certificates. This means that gold may be exported to pay the obligations abroad of the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Reserve banks which were incurred prior to the date of the order, namely, April 20, 1933.

If a European central bank should send $100,000,000 in Federal Reserve currency to a bank in this country for redemption, that bank could easily ship gold to Europe in exchange for that currency. Such Federal Reserve currency would represent "contracts entered into prior to the date of the order." If the Bank for International Settlements or any other foreign bank holding any of the present gambling-debt paper of the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Reserve banks should draw a draft for the settlement of such an obligation, gold would be shipped to them because the debt contract would have been entered into prior to the date of the order. So you see, Mr. Chairman, every provision seems to have been made for the export of gold to pay the gambling debts of the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Reserve banks.

Mr. Chairman, the Federal Reserve Act requires the Federal Reserve banks to redeem their Federal Reserve notes in gold or lawful money. Federal Reserve currency constitutes a first and paramount lien on all the assets of the Federal Reserve banks. That is the law of the United States. They have to give up everything they possess and go through liquidation and have their books examined before they can run out on the public and refuse to redeem their currency. Roosevelt, however, by his action has said to them, "You need not pay American citizens gold in exchange for the paper money you took from the United States Treasury. You need not pay them anything of value."

Mr. Chairman, I demand that all the gold in the custody of the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Reserve banks be placed in the Treasury of the United States. The Federal Reserve banks cannot be relieved of their contractual liabilities and at the same time keep the gold belonging to the Treasury and to the people in their private possession. That gold must be placed in the people's Treasury in the custody of the United States Government.

Mr. Chairman, we will fight it out on this line if it takes all summer. We will fight it out until every dollar stolen from the American people by the international bankers of New York is repaid with compound interest to the United States Treasury. [Applause.]

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN].

BANKING SYSTEM AND VETERANS

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, I want briefly to refer to what the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania has just stated about the gold reserve and the Federal Reserve Banking System.

I agree with him in many statements that he made. However, there are a few statements with which I take issue. The first one is his accusation of the present administration's being responsible for the closing of all the banks in the country. May I suggest that a few days before the preceding administration left the Capital City, Mr. Ogden Mills, the Secretary of the Treasury, asked the people of the United States and the banks to lend this Government \$90,000,000. He asked them to submit bids ending on Saturday before the new administration took office on Tuesday; and may I suggest to the gentleman that the bids submitted required this Government to pay the highest rate of interest for short-term paper it has ever had to pay in the history of our Nation. The Government was required to pay  $4\frac{1}{4}$  percent for 90-day paper. Before that we had been getting money for the Government for as low as the equivalent of 13 cents for the use of \$100 one year on 90-day paper. Within the last month we have obtained the use of money on Government 90-day securities for a rate of 40 cents for the use of \$100 one year. This goes to show that there was a scarcity of money and credit and the banks were in serious condition when the new administration came in. There was such a scarcity of money and credit and confidence had become so completely destroyed it was absolutely necessary that Congress enact the banking law March 9, 1933.

Mr. PARKER of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield.

Mr. PARKER of Georgia. Does the gentleman know in how many States the banks were closed prior to March 4?

PUNISHMENT OF GOLD HOARDERS

In connection with the question as to whether it is legal or illegal for people to turn in their gold, why should the people resist this order if the gold is needed for a greater reserve to protect and make stronger the credit of the Nation at a time when so much will have to be expended for public purposes? They receive for the gold they turn in currency—money that is worth just as much as the gold—that can be used in any market in the United States or in any market in the world to purchase just as much as the gold would purchase. So why should they refuse to turn in their gold if they can get for it value that is equivalent to the gold that has been deposited?

We have today the largest gold reserve of any nation in all the world. We have more gold than all other nations in the world combined, except France. We have almost as much gold as we had at the highest point of gold reserve in our history.

There is no lack of gold. There is no lack of gold reserve. We have a sufficient gold reserve to authorize the issuance of $4,000,000,000 additional money, and then still have a gold reserve exceeding 40 percent. No country on earth has ever said by legislative act that more than 40 percent in gold should be required to maintain its currency. Instead of giving so much time and attention to broadening the gold base by devaluation of the gold dollar, we should expand the currency on the present gold base. If we will not expand on the present base, what assurance have we that there will be expansion if the base is broadened?

THE SO-CALLED "ECONOMY ACT"

Now, in connection with money, budgets and Government expenditures, I want to discuss the recent Economy Act. We will have before us in a few days what is known as "the independent offices appropriation bill." This appropriation bill is going to carry into effect the economy bill Congress passed on the third day of this special session, the 11th day of March 1933. When this independent offices appropriation bill is submitted to you and you read it you will be reminded of the hardships and the misery that are going to be imposed upon a large group of people in the United States. This question must be viewed from the standpoint of the general welfare, the interest of the country must come first, and ahead of that of any group or any class.

ADMINISTRATION'S ECONOMY PROGRAM

The administration submitted the general program of economy carrying out the policy that was declared in the Democratic platform of reducing expenditures 25 percent, and I think it was the duty of this Congress to take that proclamation from the President and carry out his wish and his desire by reducing the appropriations of this Government 25 percent; in other words, carry out the promise made to the people in the Democratic platform.

SUBSTANTIAL REDUCTIONS FOR VETERANS ONLY

The only criticism I have to offer, if you want to call it a criticism—it should not be considered a criticism—is that we did not make more reductions in other places and fewer reductions when it came to veterans and their dependents of the World War and Spanish-American War. Now is no time to reduce the buying power of the people or to slow up the velocity of money and credit. These checks represent practically the only medium of exchange in many communities of this Nation. Every dollar turns over on an average of 15 times a year, so while one veteran is helped $1, other people—not necessarily veterans—are helped $14 more.

NON-SERVICE-CONNECTED CASES

We have on the pension rolls—we will call them all pensions for convenience—at this time 760,000 World War veterans. Four hundred and twenty-five thousand of these veterans are suffering from disabilities that they cannot prove, according to the rules and regulations of the Veterans' Bureau, to be connected with their military service. Consequently 400,000 of the 425,000 will automatically be stricken from the pension rolls June 30, 1933. There will remain 25,000 who are now receiving $40 a month, but who will receive $20 a month after June 30 because they are permanently and totally disabled from doing work of any kind whatsoever and cannot furnish the necessary proof to service connect their cases.

SERVICE-CONNECTED CASES

There are 365,000 veterans of the World War who are now drawing compensation for disabilities connected with their military service in time of war. By reason of this recent Economy Act approximately 160,000 of these veterans are going to be cut off. Congress has said by legislative act and decree in the so-called "Economy Act" that these 160,000 have disabilities that are not connected with their service, when the best-trained legal and medical advice available to Congress has heretofore said that their disabilities were connected with their military service. These veterans were persuaded to cease and desist from further efforts to collect information from hospital records, doctor's records, living witnesses, and from other sources, but were told by legislative act that they had service-connected disabilities. Now they are removed from the pension roll, and the testimony that was then available to them in many instances is not available to them now.

NUMBER REDUCED MORE THAN 60 PERCENT

When you sum it up, you find that you are reducing the number on the pension roll by reason of the World War alone by 470,000, and you are allowing only 290,000 to remain on the roll.

HARDSHIPS THAT WILL FOLLOW

Let me suggest to you some of the abuses and hardships that will follow the enactment of this so-called "economy law." I am submitting this in order that you may know just what this bill does and in order that you may use your influence to correct some of these major hardships at least. This morning a representative of blind veterans came to my office, a blind veteran with his two little children. He lives in Baltimore. He has a disability that was connected with his military service, but by reason of this act he and 24 of his comrades who live in Baltimore will be stricken from the compensation roll on June 30, and after that not a penny of compensation will they draw, when the best medical testimony on earth has declared that their disabilities were connected with their military service. They will possibly be permitted to draw a disability allowance of $20 a month if they are unable to earn anything; that is, if they are totally and permanently disabled.

Congress passed a law back in 1924 which said to these veterans that they need not furnish further proof that their disabilities are connected with the military service in time of war; that Congress has made an investigation and is convinced that their disabilities are service-connected and their names will accordingly be placed on the compensation rolls. The proof that was then available to them is possibly in many instances now lost or destroyed.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. Are all the 25 blind?

Mr. PATMAN. The representative of them came to my office. Yes; all of them are blind.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. And they will be stricken from the rolls, will they?

Mr. PATMAN. They will be stricken from the rolls; yes.

WIDOWS AND ORPHANS OF VETERANS OF DIFFERENT WARS

Consider the cases of widows and orphans of veterans of the different wars in connection with this recent law. Suppose a case where a veteran dies from a disability in no way connected with his military service. If his widow was the wife of a veteran of the war between the States on the side of the North, she will continue to draw every dollar that she has been drawing in the past except a 10-percent reduction for 1 year. If the widow was the wife of a Spanish-American War veteran, she will draw in the future one half of what she has drawn in the past, $15 a month. If she is the widow of a World War veteran, with little children, she will not draw 1 penny on earth in the future. How can Congress defend a law making such discriminations against widows of different wars.

AN UNFORTUNATE SITUATION FOR WIDOWS AND ORPHANS

Let me tell you where an abuse or hardship comes in. The husband before he died thought, in the event of his death caused by a service-connected disability, that his widow would be placed on the pension roll because the law required it. He thought that his widow would continue to draw a pension and that further proof of service connection of his disability would never be required. He was justified in believing it.

The husband, therefore, made no effort to otherwise connect his case than by presumption of law. He was told by Uncle Sam, "Your case is on the compensation roll and you have a service-connected-disability case, connected with your service in time of war." Then the husband dies, and after he is gone the widow is stricken from the rolls. Ah, the lips of that poor veteran are sealed by death. He cannot come back to this earth and tell that poor widow and these poor, innocent little children the names of the witnesses or the testimony that might be produced in order to service connect his case according to the rules and regulations of the Veterans' Bureau and the laws of this country. Is not this doing all these widows and children an awful injustice? Certainly it is; and I can point out not one but dozens of such instances where hardships will be worked upon various classes of veterans and their dependents of the World War and the Spanish-American War under this law.

TOLD SERVICE-CONNECTED CASES NOT TO BE DISTURBED

We were told that there would be no reductions in the case of veterans who suffered their disabilities in combat or in line of duty—"No; we are not going to take a penny from them"—but may I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that this bill will take from one man, whose name I can mention if necessary, who lost a leg from a wound received in no man's land, the sum of $30 a month, or a 35 percent reduction. Another man who had a gunshot wound in the shoulder, receiving $22, will be reduced to $8 a month. Another man who lost a leg, from $80 down to $40 a month; and practically all service-connected cases are reduced 50 percent. Yet we were told that we were not going to molest the veterans whose disabilities were connected with service in line of duty.

Mr. MOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. For just a brief question.

DID MEMBERS KNOW PRINTED HEARINGS AVAILABLE?

Mr. MOTT. Who told us all that? Who gave us the assurance that such disabled veterans would not be interfered with?

Mr. PATMAN. We were told that by the National Economy League, the United States Chamber of Commerce, and other promoters of this iniquitous legislation. They sold it to the country and to the Congress by making such representations and, too, by misrepresenting the facts in many other ways. When this bill was introduced in the House on March 10, it was also introduced in the Senate, and on March 10, at 3 o'clock, our Economy Committee, composed of the Honorable JOHN McDUFFIE, of Alabama; the Honorable CLIFFORD WOODRUM, of Virginia; the Honorable JACOB MILLIGAN, of Missouri; and the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] who is sitting over here; and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MCGUGIN], also from that side of the aisle, were present at a hearing at the Senate Finance Committee. They had extended hearings.

Mr. Hines testified, and so did Mr. Douglas, the Budget Director. The hearing commenced at 3 o'clock p.m., March 10, and closed at 5:30 o'clock p.m., March 10. The Democratic caucus was held Saturday, March 11, at 10 o'clock a.m. The Democratic caucus refused to approve the bill as written, but consented for the veterans to take a 25-percent reduction. Notwithstanding the action of the Democratic caucus, the bill was brought in the House shortly after 12 o'clock noon, March 11, and a special rule adopted for its consideration which prevented amendments.

CAMPAIGN OF LIES AND MISREPRESENTATIONS

These printed hearings were available on March 11 at 9 o'clock. Five hundred copies of them were delivered to the Senate Finance Committee, and these gentlemen on the Economy Committee evidently had access to these hearings. You were charged and are now charged with knowledge of what was in these printed hearings, because they were available, and if you did not obtain a copy before your vote in the House and learn all about the bill, it is presumably your fault and your funeral and no one else's. In the printed hearings Mr. Douglas disclosed what was expected to be done if the bill were enacted into law; it was enacted and what Mr. Douglas said would be done has been done. I will confess that I did not know there had been a hearing on the bill; I understood no hearing had been held; I did not see a printed copy of the hearings for 2 weeks; when the copy was obtained it had printed on the top of it, "Executive session—confidential." I immediately made an investigation and obtained the facts as I have related them to you. Although we knew nothing about the printed hearings' being available, I am of the opinion that we were charged with notice.

Mr. MOTT. I quite agree with the gentleman, and I will state for the information of the gentleman that I voted against the economy bill, as he did, but the question I asked the gentleman was from whom did he get these assurances.

Mr. PATMAN. We had them here on the floor of the House. And from the National Economy League, and other sponsors of the campaign of lies and misrepresentations. The National Economy League was and is now an outlaw organization. It is a lawbreaker. It refused to comply with the Corrupt Practices Act of 1925. The officers did not want the people to know who was furnishing them money and how much they were making by deceiving the people and destroying the rights of the veterans.

Mr. MOTT. We got them from the White House, did we not?

Mr. TABER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. TABER. They did not come from me. I knew they were going to be cut. I did not know the amount, but I never told anyone they would not be cut.

Mr. PATMAN. Did the gentleman vote for the bill?

Mr. TABER. Certainly I voted for the bill.

Mr. PATMAN. Why did not the gentleman tell the Members of the House that these committee hearings were available?

Mr. TABER. I had the hearings with me and I read from them on the floor here.

Mr. PATMAN. I did not know the gentleman was reading from printed hearings. I heard no reference to printed hearings during the debate. If the Members of this House had seen these hearings, I do not believe they would have voted for this bill without making material changes in it. On page 40 of the hearings the proposed reductions and eliminations are itemized. The story was told on that page.

Mr. CARPENTER of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield to me so that I may add something?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield.

Mr. CARPENTER of Kansas. I will ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] if I did not ask him if they did not contemplate cutting the veterans $400,000,000, and his answer to me was that they would be cut $375,000,000.

Mr. PATMAN. When they told you they were going to cut $400,000,000 or $375,000,000 annually from veteran benefits, there was only one conclusion for you to reach, that service-connected cases would have to bear a reduction of around $200,000,000 annually. That is the reason I did not vote for the bill. I knew where these cuts and reductions would have to come from. I knew that these service-connected cases were going to have to be cut 50 percent; and you did, too. There was no way around it, and yet we were told by many that service-connected cases would take no losses.

Mr. MOTT and Mr. DUNN rose.

Mr. MOTT. We were told that by the President, were we not?

Mr. PATMAN. I am sorry, but I cannot yield further to the gentleman. I have heretofore stated who told us that service-connected cases would take no loss.

THE NATIONAL ECONOMY LEAGUE

The four great means of communication are the press, the radio, the screen, and the stage. The National Economy League, with substantial support from these means of communication with the people, backed by millions of dollars, propagandized the country with false and misleading information, which has deceived good people. It is said "every dog has his day." The National Economy League, which received support from war profiteers who made money by reason of this country's misery and misfortune during the war, and from high ranking officers and ex-officers who are now drawing from $5,000 to $18,000 a year pension from the Government, has had its day. The veterans will have their day. They will never ask for more than justice; no one should ask that they accept less. As they sacrificed in time of war, they are willing to sacrifice during a great emergency in time of peace. I hope they will not be called upon to make a greater sacrifice than any other class. When the people are in a position to more soberly consider veteran's legislation, without the interference of the Economy League, I am sure they will be convinced that many of the benefits that have been taken away from veterans and their dependents should be restored; that economies in government can be effected in other ways that will be less harmful to the general welfare.

Now I will yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

DEFLATIONARY MEASURE

Mr. DUNN. I want to say that I did not vote for the bill; but is there any way that we can give the soldiers back this money?

Mr. PATMAN. Until the awful consequences of this legislation are brought home to the people I doubt that the Congress or the President will recommend substantial changes. Each congressional district in the United States is going to lose about $1,000,000 a year under this bill. This money would turn over about 15 times during the year. Therefore each congressional district is going to lose $15,000,000 a year in buying power. This will not only hurt the veterans; it will hurt everybody. In addition to that, I shudder to think of the misery, want, and despair that is likely to be caused. Regardless of the merits of the legislation, is not this a bad time to place into effect such a deflationary measure when buying power among the masses is so badly needed?

HOW COMBAT INJURIES AFFECTED

Through the courtesy of Mr. Tom Kirby, national legislative chairman of the Disabled American Veterans, and Mr. Ralph L. Chambers, national rehabilitation chairman of the Disabled American Veterans, I have been furnished with a list of actual cases, including names and claim numbers, which disclose the enormous reductions that will be suffered by veterans who were injured in combat with the public enemy.

One veteran who was drawing $26 a month for a disability suffered on the field of battle will draw $8 hereafter, under the terms of this bill.

Another one drawing $19 a month will get $8. Another one drawing $65 a month for a disability incurred in combat, a man who spilled his blood for the cause of his country upon the field of battle in time of war, will be reduced from $65 to $20 a month.

Another one for a similar disability reduced from $50 to $20, and I could go on and give you a lot of similar examples.

Mr. MOTT. Who made these recommendations? Was it not the President?

Mr. PATMAN. I hope the gentleman will bear with me for a few minutes. I have explained how people were sold on and were demanding these reductions by reason of the campaign conducted by the so-called "National Economy League."

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. I understood the gentleman to say a moment ago that the cut should have been taken from other veterans.

Mr. PATMAN. From other sources.

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. Does not the gentleman think that Senators and Representatives themselves and others could have well afforded to take a little bit larger cut?

Mr. PATMAN. I thank the gentleman for his suggestion.

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. I should like to have the gentleman answer the question.

Mr. PATMAN. I agree with the gentleman. Start at the top with reductions and come down.

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. I served in the Senate for $7,500 a year, and I had to work much harder there than I do over here.

Mr. PATMAN. If you want to distribute the purchasing power, do not start at the top but the bottom, then everybody will be benefited. It is much easier for money to go from the bottom to the top than it is for money to go from the top to the bottom.

CLAIMED NEW YORK PAYS ONE THIRD ALL INCOME TAXES

It is said that we will save by this act $450,000,000. Will we save that money? No; it is going to shift the burden from the shoulders of the National Government to the shoulders of local charity and to the States. That is what it is going to do. The State of New York pays a lot of money in income taxes. It is not paid by all the people of New York. It is paid by a few people in New York. Much of it has been collected from the people from all over the Nation by reason of exorbitant prices received and with the aid and support of the Government. If they exact too much money from the people for services, commodities, and interest by using the credit of the Nation free, as many of them are doing today, it occurs to me that a large part of it, over a certain amount, should be taken into the Public Treasury and used in the interest of the general welfare. Why should one State be permitted to keep it? There is too much concentration of wealth now, and we should not do anything to encourage further concentration of wealth.

The statement is made that people of New York pay one third of all income taxes to the National Government. If they pay according to their ability to pay, why should not they pay one third if they are paying like everyone else? They should not be discriminated against; neither should they be favored over the people of any other State. Is there anything wrong about the citizens of New York State paying money into the Treasury according to the same laws, same conditions, and the same amount as paid by citizens of other States?

SHIFTING TAX BURDEN IN INTEREST OF WALL STREET BANKERS

But let me show you where it is in the interest of Wall Street and the international bankers to shift this burden. Let me show you where it is for their interest to shift every burden or expenditure they can from the National Government to the State and local governments.

We are told that this act will save the Government $450,000,000 annually. If New York pays one third of the income tax, that would be $150,000,000 for the State of New York. If $450,000,000 a year can be saved on veterans, a few people in New York City will be saved almost $150,000,000 a year in income taxes. New York State will then furnish assistance to the veterans of that State through the charity organizations at a possible expense of around $15,000,000 a year, thereby saving the few income-tax payers around $135,000,000 a year. There is an incentive to change the burden from the National Government to the local charities. Should that be done? No. It is contrary to the established policy of the Government. The National Government has always opposed requiring one who served the country honorably in time of war to resort to local charity for help if later in life he is dependent and needs his country, just as in time of war his country needed him.

The pensions paid to the veterans and their dependents of the War of 1812, Mexican and Indian Wars, and the War between the States were paid by the National Government. The money was raised principally through customs duties, thereby equally distributing the burden to all the States, not in proportion, however, to ability to pay, but according to the amount of goods purchased, including the bare necessities of life.

From 1791 to 1917 practically all of the ordinary receipts of the Government came from customs and internal revenue. The income tax law changed our tax system. Import duties being high in order to raise this revenue, manufacturing industries were thereby enabled to collect high prices for what they produced. The people paid several dollars to every one that went into the Treasury. However, just because New York profited doubly by this arrangement is no reason why an unjust burden should be placed upon the good people of that State at this time. At the same time our governmental policy should not be changed in order to accommodate a few people in New York.

The sixteenth amendment to our National Constitution changed our system of raising revenue. The principal support for the Government now comes from the income tax, the fairest tax on earth, which is based upon ability to pay; if no profit is made over and above a liberal exemption, no income tax is paid.

This is no time to change the policy of our Government in regard to pensions. If the policy was right after every war in the history of our country it is right now.

ABUSES UNDER THE OLD LAW

I admit that under the old law there were abuses. The Government was being defrauded in some cases, I am sure, but every day the perpetrators of those frauds were being discovered by the Veterans' Bureau, and they were being eliminated and eliminated quickly from the rolls. Certain veterans were also enjoying certain rights that could not be defended. These rights should have been taken away without destroying all the good laws that have been enacted for veterans. In other words, we should not burn down the barn to get rid of the rats. I believe that had the old law continued, in a very few months you would never have been able to point your finger to a single case and say, "There is a man drawing compensation or pension from the Government who is not entitled to it," for every one of such cases would have been stricken from the rolls. Do you not think that would have been the better course to pursue, especially at a time when we have a currency famine and when there is an insufficient medium of exchange throughout the length and breadth of this country? And further, in view of the fact that in many communities in this Nation the checks sent there by the Veterans' Bureau from the National Government represent practically the only medium of exchange the people of those communities have? Do you not think this should have been postponed, that it would have been in the interest of the general welfare of all of the people, for it to be postponed, regardless of how you feel as to a permanent policy in the future?

I am not saying this in criticism; I am saying it to suggest to you these abuses in order that we may try to get them corrected in a way that will satisfy the country and the administration, and at the same time do justice to the helpless ones in every State in this country of ours.

WHAT ABOUT THE BIG BOYS WHO CAUSED THIS REDUCTION?

Take the ones who caused this great economy move to be perpetrated, this move which is deflationary instead of a needed inflationary movement. Let us see if it is fair for them to receive what they are receiving from the United States Government, considering the unbalanced Budget they have told you so much about.

Archibald Roosevelt, Admiral Richard Byrd, General Harbord, General Pershing, and Admiral Sims are entitled to the credit or responsibility—whichever you choose to call it—for the passage of this legislation. Of course, they had the support of the Mellons, Morgans, Mills, Myers, and Mitchells, who represent millions, misery, misfortune, mortgages, and malfeasance. Let us see how these gentlemen are coming out after the economy storm has blown over. Archibald Roosevelt, of Teapot Dome and black-satchel fame, and his gang will continue to raid the Treasury each month to the tune of many thousands of dollars on an ocean mail contract.

Admiral Byrd will continue to draw around $4,000 a year, after his contribution of $300 a year toward balancing the Budget, for a disability in no way connected with military service in time of war. General Harbord will draw more than $5,000 a year, after his $400 contribution toward the cause that is so near and dear to his heart—balancing the Budget. Admiral Sims the same; neither is receiving his pension for disabilities in any way connected with his military service. General Harbord also receives a salary of $50,000 or $75,000 a year as president of the Radio Corporation of America. General Pershing, whom we all admire and respect, very foolishly permitted the use of his name for this unworthy cause. The general is enthusiastic about balancing the Budget, but he will fare pretty well in the future. Before the Economy Act was passed he was receiving $19,709.05 a year pension from the Government; his reduction amounted to $1,434.05, leaving him $18,275 a year, or $1,522.91 a month. He is drawing that amount for a disability in no way connected with the military service during war.

PETTED AND PRIVILEGED NEPHEWS OF UNCLE SAM

Admiral Byrd, Admiral Sims, and General Pershing entered Government service when they were very young boys; they were educated at public expense, actually paid by the Government to go to school. The admirals went to the Naval Academy and the general went to West Point. They have never known what it was to want for anything; they have all had life jobs with the Government or life pensions. General Harbord spent his life in the Army since boyhood. Are they in a position to sympathize with the veteran who is down and out, who has a wife, children, and aged parents to support, without a job and no property? I venture to say that they have been viewing the situation more from the cold-blooded standpoint of money and Budget than from the human standpoint.

HUMAN BUDGET SHOULD BE BALANCED

It is as important that the human budget be balanced as it is that the Government's Budget be balanced. It is not right for the citizens who build our country in time of peace and who save it in time of war to actually be in want in this land of plenty. If the human budget is balanced, the Government Budget will automatically balance itself.

Under the present law the veteran who has suffered in battle the loss of both feet and both hands or is blinded in both eyes will receive $125 a month. Should any general or admiral receive more?

SPANISH-AMERICAN WAR VETERANS

The Spanish-American War veterans are disturbed more than the veterans of any other war. Only about 10 percent of the present number will remain on the pension rolls. It is very difficult for one of these veterans to prove service-connection; hospital records were not very well kept in those days, witnesses have died, and evidence has been destroyed. They have reached an age in life when it is almost impossible for them to get a job or to earn a livelihood. They will not suffer alone; their families and other dependents will be forced so suffer along with them.

GREAT VICTORY OVER SICK VETERANS

Now that the so-called "Economy Act" has become a law, the National Economy League is becoming inactive. The generals and admirals are sending in their resignations. I wonder why they do not pursue their economy program and cause some of the big fellows to take a little reduction along with the veterans. It seems that they had one object only in mind, and since that has been accomplished they are not interested further. Under date of April 22, 1933, the National Economy League sent out a letter thanking Members of Congress for voting for the economy bill. This letter was signed by Admiral Byrd. It states:

At the last meeting of the managing committee of the National Economy League a resolution was passed instructing me to express to you the appreciation of the members of the league for your vote on the economy bill. The members of the league admire your courage and patriotism.

I did not vote for the so-called "economy bill"; I voted against it. That assumption was just about as well founded as most of the statements published by the league to mislead and deceive the people. The courage and patriotism of a Member who voted for the bill is admired by the members of the league. Does it take much courage and patriotism to condemn helpless, innocent, sick, and diseased veterans who are drawing $12 a month from their Government? They do not own any newspapers; they have no rights over the air; they never rent a hall and cause an audience to be assembled in order that people may be either commended or condemned.

They are merely at the mercy of those who hold such rights and exercise such privileges. One voting for the bill had the consolation of knowing that he would be called great by the so-called "big men and women"; that most of the newspapers would sing his praises; that he would be supported in his views by the radio, screen, and the stage.

BUY, BUY, BUY CAMPAIGN

Times were good in 1928-29. The slogan then was "Buy! Buy! Buy!" Money and credits were moving rapidly; they had great velocity. Then the Economy League type commenced the slogan, "Save! Save! Save!" As velocity of money and credit is slowed up times commence to get harder; deflation, which should be as much dreaded as a plague or epidemic of disease, commences to stalk over our fair land. Old Man Deflation brings poverty, misery, distress, suicides, and despair. When a wage earner loses his job business loses a customer. The smaller the wages received by the wage earners and the smaller the amount received by the farmers for what they produce the less business is transacted. The National Economy League has done more to cause, aggravate, and accentuate the depression than all other organizations and people in America. The selfish-type creditor wants money high so that the 4-percent interest he receives will purchase as much in commodities and services as 10 percent would purchase under normal conditions. He overlooks the fact that the people may not be able to pay even the 4 percent; it is not to his interest, because it is better for him to accept a dollar that will not purchase so much than not be able to collect any dollar at all. However, he is greedy, he cannot see beyond the end of his nose. Where there is greed there is no vision. The Good Book says where there is no vision the people perish.

NO UNBALANCED BUDGET IF BANKING LAW COMPLIED WITH

If the Federal Reserve Act, to which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFadden] referred, was complied with, we would not have an unbalanced Budget and we would have plenty of money. These powerful bankers that have been controlling the monetary system of this Nation would have to pay a fair and reasonable interest charge for using the credit of our Nation. Every bill—currency—that is issued represents a mortgage on all the homes and other property of all the people in this Nation. A few powerful bankers are giving these mortgages daily by issuing money on the credit of the Nation. Section 16 of the Federal Reserve Act says that an interest rate "shall" be charged—made mandatory. The Federal Reserve Board set the zero rate and the Government has thereby lost billions of dollars in revenue.

CAN SAVE $360,000,000 A YEAR

Let me show you how we can save enough money to restore these helpless, dependent men, women, and orphans to the pension roll and put the buying power out amongst the people and let it remain there until conditions are a little different. Then, if you want to change the policy of this Government as to pensions do it, but do not do it now, when they need this money in every community, and when in many instances it is the only medium of exchange they have. We have a national debt of $21,000,000,000. Our country is not bankrupt. It is worth more than $300,000,000,000, with a debt of $21,000,000,000. More than half of these bonds are held by Federal Reserve banks, private institutions, not one dollar of stock being owned by the Government and by other private banks. The Government is paying $725,000,000 a year interest on those bonds.

The bankers have the privilege of placing the bonds held by them with the Treasury of the United States and receiving new money in return. They can loan this new money to the people and receive interest for its use; at the same time they will be receiving interest from the Government on the bonds deposited with the Treasury to secure the new money. Instead of paying bondholders a bonus of $725,000,000 a year, let us at least pay off half of that amount, the part held by the banks of the Nation, with new money and save about $360,000,000 a year, and through that saving restore most of these cases, especially the cases where such great hardships have been worked, put them back on the roll, and send this purchasing power back into every nook and corner of our Nation.

In order to provide for an elastic currency or to make sure that there would not be too much money a law may be enacted permitting the holder of any part of the money so issued to be exchanged for United States Government bonds drawing a certain rate of interest and to reconvert the bonds under certain conditions into money. This is not necessary but may be done to answer the argument of the reactionary, who is holding onto the coat tail of progress screaming "Too much money!" It is not the amount of money that alarms the powerful bankers; it is the possible loss of control of the monetary system that they are concerned about. They can control the monetary system and value of everything as long as there is so little money that people must depend on credit. May I invite your attention to the fact that during the last few months this country has deflated in bank deposits more than $15,000,000,000, in addition to the five billions tied up in closed banks? [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] has expired.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and to include therein certain excerpts in connection with the subject matter I have discussed.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, the Clerk may read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Compiling testimony in contested-election cases: For services in compiling, arranging for the printer, reading proof, indexing testimony, stenography and typewriting, supervision of the work, and expenses incurred in the contested-election cases of the Seventy-second Congress, as authorized by the act entitled "An act relating to contested elections", approved March 2, 1887 (U.S.C., title 2, secs. 201-226), $1,000.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment offered by Mr. BUCHANAN: On page 2 strike out lines 15 to 22, inclusive.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

ARCHITECT OF THE CAPITOL

Capitol power plant: For an additional amount for lighting, heating, and power for the Capitol, Senate and House Office Buildings, Supreme Court Building, Congressional Library Buildings, etc., including the same objects specified under this head in the Legislative Appropriation Act for the fiscal year 1933, $30,000.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks to include a brief resolution from my State legislature addressed to Members of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman and my colleagues, the citizens of Florida are deeply interested in further Federal aid for highways. We believe road building to be one of the best means of relieving the unemployed and at the same time expending public money in a safe and profitable investment. Probably over 80 percent of road expenditures goes directly or indirectly into labor and, consequently, relief of the unemployed.

Senate Concurrent Resolution No. 12 by the Florida Legislature urges the further expenditures of Federal funds for road building and particularly urges the completion of the Florida Gulf Coast Highway. This is one of the most necessary and important highways in my State and should be now completed.

The resolution follows:

Senate Concurrent Resolution 12

Whereas the Legislature of the State of Florida by joint resolution in 1929 memorialized Congress, the Federal Bureau of Public Roads, and the State Road Department of Florida to use every possible effort to federalize the Gulf Coast Highway, which is legally known as "State Roads 10, 15, and 115"; and

Whereas the resolution referred to above has only been partially carried out; and

Whereas the State of Florida and the counties of the Gulf coast of Florida have spent approximately $15,000,000 and the funds of both the State and counties are now exhausted; and

Whereas all of the Gulf coast counties and cities and civic bodies have passed resolutions setting forth the necessity for continuing the construction of the Gulf Coast Highway in order to relieve the distressing unemployment situation in the Gulf coast counties and cities owing to the serious decline in the oyster, fishing, and other businesses peculiar to these counties and cities; and

Whereas the State road system of Florida cannot be properly rounded out and completed, nor can the hundreds of millions of dollars invested therein begin to pay a full return on this investment until the Gulf Coast Highway is completed; and

Whereas the construction of the Gulf Coast Highway has been officially declared of military and strategic importance to the United States Government; and

Whereas the public-works committee now arranging the public-works program for President Roosevelt has the authority and power to include in said program the construction of Federal roads; and

Whereas road construction in Florida will provide work for the relief of unemployment, both in direct employment and in the manufacture and transportation of Florida road-building material: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of the State of Florida (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Public Works Committee of President Roosevelt, the Federal Bureau of Public Works, our Senators and Congressmen in Washington, the Governor of Florida, and the State road department are hereby requested to secure the immediate federalization of all of the Gulf Coast Highway and to use every effort at their command to allocate funds to Florida for the immediate construction of the Gulf Coast Highway in this State; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded by the secretary of the State of Florida, under the great seal of the State of Florida in due form to the Congress of the United States, and the several Members thereof from Florida, to the Governor of Florida, and to the State road department.

Approved by the Governor of Florida, May 2, 1933.

STATE OF FLORIDA,

Office Secretary of State, ss:

I, R. A. Gray, secretary of state of the State of Florida, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a true and correct copy of Senate Concurrent Resolution No. 12, passed by the Legislature of Florida, session 1933, and filed in this office.

Given under my hand and the great seal of the State of Florida, at Tallahassee, the capital, this 2d day of May A.D. 1933.

[SEAL]

R. A. GRAY, Secretary of State.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF LABOR

BUREAU OF IMMIGRATION

For refund to Joseph Vigliotti, of Detroit, Mich., as authorized by Private Act No. 318, approved March 4, 1933, $1,500.

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I have introduced a bill (H.R. 5203) to reduce the allowable deposit of one individual in Postal Savings banks from $2,500 to $500 and to reduce the interest on Postal Savings accounts from 2 to one half of 1 percent. This measure is designed to halt the mounting deposits in Postal Savings accounts, which has reached the $1,000,000,000 mark, practically all of which represents funds drawn from country banks.

In recent years Postal Savings banks have become a menace, not only to our legitimate banking system but to the people, especially in small towns and rural communities, who are interested in the maintenance of well-managed and solvent local banks.

Under my bill the deposits of one individual is limited to $500 and the interest rate is made so low that hoarders will not be encouraged to withdraw their money from banks and place it in postal savings accounts. If my bill is enacted, we may reasonably anticipate that in a few months a large part of the $1,000,000,000 now in Postal Savings banks will be returned to legitimate banks and trust companies or invested in safe loans or in productive industry.

Under my bill if a man is determined to hoard his money in a postal savings account he may do so, but not in excess of $500, and while his deposit will be guaranteed he would get only nominal interest thereon. My bill will take the profit out of hoarding.

In my opinion the Federal Government should not sanction any system that encourages people to withdraw their money from solvent and well-managed banks and hoard it in Postal Savings banks. At a future date I hope to find time to discuss this subject in detail.

I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LOZIER]?

Mr. GOSS. Reserving the right to object—and I shall not in this case—I think these matters should be taken up in the House rather than in the Committee, and I am going to object to any further requests, if they are made this afternoon, until we get back into the House.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LOZIER]?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Treasury Department: Chester A. Poling, Inc. (United States District Court, Eastern District of New York, November 22, 1932, damages due to collision between the lighter Poling Brothers No. 1 and the Coast Guard vessel Thippe), $11,215.02; Seacoast Trawling Co. (United States District Court, District of Massachusetts, March 6, 1933, damages due to collision between the fishing vessel Juneal and the Coast Guard patrol boat C.G. 212), $945.42.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to correct the spelling of a word.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment offered by Mr. BUCHANAN: On page 5, line 15, strike out the word "Thippe" and insert the word "Trippe."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. McREYNOLDS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill H.R. 5390, the third deficiency appropriation bill, directed him to report the same back with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them en grosse.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The bill was passed.

On motion by Mr. BUCHANAN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. McFADDEN. Reserving the right to object, how much time for general debate is allowed on this bill?

Mr. MOTT. Reserving the right to object, does the rule provide for amendments?

REMONETIZATION OF SILVER

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include therein a resolution introduced by myself.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Idaho?

There was no objection.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the following resolution introduced by me, stating in substance that it is the sense of the House of Representatives that the delegates appointed by the President to the International Economic Conference shall work unceasingly for the remonetization of silver:

Resolution

Whereas the nations of the world, conforming to the operation of economic law from time immemorial, have based their system of money currencies upon the coinage of the precious metals, gold and silver, thereby securing automatic control of the money volume necessary to the vital and controlling function of money;

Whereas under the operation of economic law it is necessary that the increase in the volume of primary money or money of ultimate redemption must keep even pace with expanding business and growing population in order that the relation of debtor and creditor can be maintained on a just and equitable basis, thereby insuring the stability of the banking and financial systems of the several countries, and at the same time to supply a stable medium of exchange between the people of the several nations, the use of both gold and silver is necessary;

Whereas in the wisdom acquired from the experience of the ages, the Government of the United States recognizing and conforming to this economic law, has placed upon its statute books and there is now in force a law contained in section 311 of the United States Code of Laws passed November 1, 1893 (c. 8, 28 Stat. 4), reading as follows: "It is hereby declared to be the policy of the United States to continue the use of both gold and silver as standard money, and to coin both gold and silver into money of equal intrinsic and exchangeable value, such equality to be secured through international agreement, or by such safeguards of legislation as will insure the maintenance of the parity in value of the coins of the two metals and the equal power of every dollar at all times in the markets and in the payment of debts. And it is hereby further declared that the efforts of the Government should be steadily directed to the establishment of such a safe system of bimetalism as will maintain at all times the equal power of every dollar coined or issued by the United States, in the markets and in the payment of debts";

Whereas in the present state of civilization and education attained by the great mass of the human family the adoption of money systems based on managed currencies must prove impractical and disastrous in operation; that for many generations to come the nations of the world must conform to economic law and adhere to the automatic system of money based on the coinage of the precious metals—gold and silver; and

Whereas in conforming to our national policy as expressed in section 311 of the United States Code of Laws: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the delegates to the International Monetary Conference, to be appointed by the President of the United States, be instructed to work unceasingly for the adoption of international bimetalism and to work to bring the several governments into an agreement to admit both gold and silver metal to their several mints for coinage at a stipulated ratio and to standardize the gold and silver coins of the several nations as to weight, fineness, diameter, tolerance, and value, so that the coins of the several nations may circulate internationally to stabilize currency, exchange, and facilitate international trade.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 3 o'clock and 52 minutes p.m.) the House, under its previous order, adjourned until tomorrow, Friday, May 5, 1933, at 11 o'clock a.m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

FRIDAY, MAY 5, 1933

The House met at 11 o'clock a.m.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Thou Spirit of the Most High, who dost prefer above all temples a pure and upright heart, make the path of duty plain; instruct us, for Thou knowest the way. May we desire and seek above all things a noble passion for Thee and a fine idealism of life. Let Thine hand be with us that we may be kept from the evil. As we are conscious of real power, may we be willing to be consecrated to the immediate and the essential needs of our land. With all honor and heroic faith may it be placed on the altar of our country. Heavenly Father, as Thou dost love us with a peculiar love, hear our prayer. By Thine unerring wisdom lead us on, and allow not our devotion to the public interest to die down, but rather may it mount higher and higher until our labors are ended. In the name of our Savior we pray. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

SALE OF SECURITIES

Mr. POUL. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Resolution 130 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 130

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H.R. 5480, a bill to provide full and fair disclosure of the character of securities sold in interstate and foreign commerce and through the mails, and to prevent frauds in the sale thereof, and for other purposes, and all points of order against said bill are hereby waived. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed 5 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the Chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, the bill shall be considered as having been read for amendment. No amendment shall be in order to said bill except amendments offered by direction of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and said amendments shall be in order, any rule of the House to the contrary notwithstanding. Amendments offered by direction of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce may be offered to any section of the bill at the conclusion of the general debate, but said amendments shall not be subject to amendment. At the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendment the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and the amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion, except one motion to recommit.

Mr. POUL. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania desire to use time in debate on the rule?

Mr. RANSLEY. We would like to have the usual time on this side of the House.

Mr. POUL. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman from Pennsylvania one half of the time, to be used by him as he sees fit.

Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 10 minutes.

Mr. Speaker, this resolution brings before the House the securities bill reported by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. It provides for 5 hours of general debate. It provides that amendments may be offered by authority of the committee only.

I am informed that the securities bill had practically a unanimous report from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. There may have been differences of opinion, but the committee was practically unanimous as to the bill as a whole.

I cannot see that any extended discussion of the rule can avail anything. It may be called another gag rule, but almost every rule that is brought in here fixing an order of business is more or less restrictive in its nature. It limits the procedure in this House that would take place if measures were considered under the general rules of the House. So the Committee on Rules felt that we were pursuing the wiser course in allowing 5 hours of debate and in confining amendments to the committee that has been working on this bill over a long period.

I am informed by members on both sides of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce that every line in the bill from beginning to end has been carefully considered by that committee, and, inasmuch as it comes here with the unanimous support of that great and powerful committee, after having given it such prolonged and careful consideration, the Committee on Rules felt that the House would not want the measure thrown open to indiscriminate amendments, and in this belief we have reported this rule, and we hope it will be unanimously adopted. [Applause.]

I reserve the remainder of my time, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield the full time allotted to this side, 30 minutes, to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES].

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein certain short excerpts from reports of committees and other documents relating to the subject.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, this is another one of those closed or gag rules which have become so common during this session of Congress; in fact, they have become the regular thing instead of the exception. Under it the bill will not be read under the 5-minute rule, and the individual Member will have no opportunity to offer any amendment to any part of the bill. The only amendments that will be in order are those that may be offered by the committee, and the committee does not intend to offer any very important ones, as I understand it.

The Republican members of the Committee on Rules voted against this rule, the same as they have voted against other gag rules which have been reported at this session. They are opposed to this rule. It is subject to the same objections that have been made to the other rules, but it is apparent that the large majority of the House is going to pass gag rules, and it would probably be futile to reiterate at this time the statements and objections which have been made to the other rules of the same character as this one, except I should like to point out that the viciousness of this sort of rule is demonstrated in the pending rule perhaps as well or better than any other rule which has been considered during this session of Congress. This securities bill contains something like 38 pages and 25 different sections. It deals with a very complex and controversial subject, and there are two outstanding provisions involving fundamental principles of public policy upon which the House of Representatives ought to be allowed to express itself sometime during the consideration of the bill. Under this rule there will be no such opportunity for it to do so.

One of the questions that the House ought to express itself upon is the one referred to in the minority views filed by the gentleman from California [Mr. LEA] and the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MERRITT], relating to the question of putting into effect in this Federal statute the blue sky laws of the different States, and another is the matter of making responsible for false statements or for omitting to state material facts the members of the boards of directors of corporations filing statements with the Federal Trade Commission giving information relating to such securities. I shall have more to say about this provision later, but the House as a whole ought to have the right to vote upon these two propositions especially.

But under this rule the House of Representatives will not be allowed to express itself on these two important questions. The Constitution guarantees freedom of speech to the ordinary citizen, but the House of Representatives during this session of Congress has not had freedom to express itself on important policies of legislation submitted to it. So much for that. I do not want to take any more time in the discussion of the rule, because I want to use a part of my time to discuss the merits of the legislation which the rule seeks to make in order.

Mr. BYRNS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BYRNS. The gentleman was a member of the subcommittee that considered this bill.

Mr. MAPES. I was.

Mr. BYRNS. I do not suppose any bill was ever brought before the gentleman's committee which received closer and more undivided attention than this particular bill.

Mr. MAPES. I think in a general way the gentleman's statement is correct.

Mr. BYRNS. I understand the gentleman himself approved of the bill in committee.

Mr. MAPES. That is correct, although there is one important provision in the bill about which I differed from the rest of the subcommittee. I shall explain that later; but the general purpose of the bill I am in hearty accord with, and I can support the legislation with a great deal of enthusiasm.

Mr. BYRNS. The gentleman is a very able Member of the House and is in the habit of giving legislation his careful attention, particularly that which comes before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. I want to ask the gentleman this question: After giving this matter 2 weeks of close, undivided attention, having rewritten, as I understand, the bill in many particulars, does the gentleman think any particular advantage could occur in the consideration of amendments offered from the floor to this bill, having in mind that the rule gives the right of free expression from Members of the House in general discussion?

Mr. MAPES. As I have said, for the most part I approve of the bill; but, regardless of my position on the bill, I do not believe it is good policy to bring in a rule which does not give the Membership of the House of Representatives generally an opportunity to express itself upon the different provisions of a bill of this importance. I believe that every Member should have an opportunity to express himself if he so desires. Debate is often very helpful and brings out points which may not have been thought of by the committee, but whatever may be the fact in that respect I do not believe that the committee, no matter how able or powerful it may be, ought to be allowed to say to a membership of 435, all of them equals, "You have got to swallow this particular piece of legislation as it is or reject it altogether."

Mr. BYRNS. I do not want to take up the gentleman's time, but I want to ask one further question. The gentleman says that after 2 weeks of thorough consideration of this particular measure there is only one provision to which he has some slight objection. I want to ask the gentleman if this rule, which gives the right to offer a motion to recommit, would not permit the gentleman as a member of the committee to secure a record vote on his amendment to that particular provision to which he refers, and, therefore, whether or not in the gentleman's opinion any right is denied the Membership of the House upon a highly involved bill like this?

Mr. MAPES. I will say to the gentleman that I could not qualify to make the motion to recommit on this particular bill if anyone who is opposed to it desires to make the motion, because I am not opposed to it. I am in favor of it, although I might change some provisions of it.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. I yield.

Mr. BRITTEN. If the contention of the gentleman on the other side is correct then every piece of legislation brought onto the floor of the House from a committee should be closed by some such a rule as this so that Members of the House can have no initiative or imagination? Not only that, but in every piece of legislation—

Mr. BYRNS. Oh, not at all.

Mr. SNELL rose.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the minority leader.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, a great many complicated pieces of legislation have come from the gentleman's committee in the last 10 or 12 years and never yet, to my knowledge, has one of them been brought on the floor of the House and provision made that it be not even read. Is that correct?

Mr. MAPES. That is correct, as far as my recollection goes.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. Yes.

Mr. O'CONNOR. The gentleman has stated that the four Republican members of the Committee on Rules voted against this form of rule.

Mr. MAPES. The gentleman from New York will confirm that, will he not?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Oh, yes; they are following a certain policy, but they had their fingers crossed when voting. Will the gentleman tell us how many Republicans on the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce were opposed to this form of rule?

Mr. MAPES. There was no vote on the question in the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Was there any objection to this form of rule in the gentleman's committee?

Mr. MAPES. The matter was not considered by the committee.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Was it not understood that this was the way it was to be brought in?

Mr. MAPES. The gentleman from New York knows that the rules do not permit the disclosure of what took place in an executive session of the committee.

Mr. O'CONNOR. The only reason I ask is that a certain disclosure was made in the Committee on Rules.

Mr. MAPES. The statement was made in the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce at the end of a session of the committee that this kind of a rule was going to be asked for, and I for one stated that I would have to oppose it.

Mr. O'CONNOR. The gentleman does not feel very badly about it?

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to take up nearly so much time in the discussion of this rule; but as long as we are on the subject, let me call attention to how this sort of thing may work. Some mathematicians have figured out what a small minority of a body can control under a procedure like this. The majority of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, for example, might favor this legislation as against a very substantial minority on that committee. That small majority might bring the legislation before a Democratic caucus, and again a very small majority of the Democratic caucus possibly might support the legislation as against a very large minority of the caucus, and by binding the Members to carry out the action of the caucus bring in a resolution or rule of this kind, and in that way make it possible for a small majority of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce practically to dictate legislation of great importance.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. Yes. I yield to my colleague on the committee.

Mr. COX. Is it not the gentleman's opinion that the adoption of this rule will insure better legislation than might be expected if the whole matter were thrown open for the writing of the law by the House.

Mr. MAPES. I could not admit that. I have too much respect for the Membership of the House.

Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to take so much time on the rule, because I want to discuss briefly the merits of the legislation. As I have said in answer to the questions of the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS], the majority leader, I am very much in favor of the object sought to be accomplished by this legislation. It has been very carefully considered by a subcommittee, and by the full committee, of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, with the help of the drafting service and others who were called in for consultation. Practically every word of the 38 pages of the bill has been weighed and considered, first by the subcommittee and then by the full committee, and I think, from the standpoint of drafting, the bill is in very excellent condition, and few indeed will question the general purposes sought to be accomplished by the legislation.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. I wish the gentleman would permit me to proceed for just a few minutes, if he will pardon me. The administration of the legislation, if the bill is enacted into law, will come under the supervision of the Federal Trade Commission. The object of the legislation, in brief, is to require those who issue securities to be sold to the public through the mails or by the use of the instruments of interstate commerce to furnish material information to the public about the securities which they are asking the public to buy. That, in my judgment, will be the chief and primary accomplishment of the legislation. It will make available to the public the information upon which the public is asked to invest its money. The information must be given in a statement to be filed with the Federal Trade Commission before the mails or the instruments of interstate commerce can be made use of to sell securities. Certain securities are excepted, but I shall not attempt to name the exceptions at this time.

The bill is not foolproof. It will not prevent anybody from putting his money into rat holes or into highly speculative ventures if he sees fit to do so, but in the exercise of reasonable care he can go to the Federal Trade Commission or to the underwriter or the dealer in the securities and find out the facts relating to the business of the corporation issuing the securities, the profits which the dealers are to receive in selling them, and the amount of money that is to go back into the treasury of the corporation after the sale is made—how much of the $100 per share, or whatever amount he pays for his stock, is really going back to the corporation, going into the treasury for the promotion of the business of the corporation.

It is not necessary here to dwell upon the need for this kind of legislation. Mr. Huston Thompson in testifying before the committee made the statement that the United States is farther behind than any other civilized nation that he knew of with respect to preserving the rights of the purchasers of securities. The American public in the last few years has become particularly "investment minded", and there probably is no other country where securities are so widely distributed among the people. It is said that during the 13 years immediately after the war something like $50,000,000,000 of securities—bonds and stocks together—were bought by the investing public in the United States. A large part of those were, as a matter of general information, of little value, and some of them had no value at all. Anything that this Congress can do to supplement the blue-sky laws of the States to protect the public in investing its money ought to be done. Of the 48 States in the Union, all but 1 have some sort of blue-sky legislation. This law does not interfere with, but supplements, those laws and makes it impossible for dealers and underwriters to evade the State laws by the shipment of their securities and prospectuses and other material in interstate commerce or through the mails.

The enactment of this law will prevent that sort of thing. I have always wanted to believe in the copy-book statements that those who occupy high positions in the business and financial world were not only men of ability but men of character as well; that the fact that they occupied such positions was an evidence that they were men worthy of confidence. The revelations of the last few years have had a tendency to shake my faith in that respect. For example, I have in my hand a report of a Senate committee which quotes from another report of a Senate committee, namely, "Report No. 1655, Seventy-first Congress, third session", relating to what took place in the District of Columbia relating to the sale of bonds of the Wardman Realty Co. I am not going to take the time to read it, but under the leave which has been granted me, I will put in an excerpt from it in the RECORD.

The excerpt is as follows:

Four members of the Investment Bankers' Association of America, namely, Halsey, Stuart & Co., Inc., Hambleton & Co., A. B. Leach & Co., Inc., and Rogers Caldwell & Co., Inc., together with William R. Compton Co., sponsored and participated in the public offering throughout the country of what they designated on their circular to be "$11,000,000 first and refunding mortgage 6½-percent serial gold bonds" of the Wardman Real Estate Properties, Inc. Even the printed description of this issue was deceptive, for, in reality, the authorized issue of bonds was $16,000,000 and the security back of the bond issue was not a first mortgage on all of the property of the issuing corporation but a second, and possibly third, mortgage as to some of the properties involved.

The same properties were made the basis of a $2,500,000 so-called "general mortgage", which was, in reality, a third or fourth mortgage as to some of the hotels and apartments listed as security for the issues. In addition the very questionable and doubtful "equities" in the properties, encumbered by the various mortgages mentioned, were made the basis for two issues of so-called "gold debentures" in the amount of $4,900,000. The companies issuing these various securities also issued common stocks to the amount of 200,000 shares.

As this excerpt shows, four investment banking houses supposed to be reputable—at least, they had a reputation for being reputable before they were put to the test by this depression—namely, Halsey, Stuart & Co., Hambleton & Co., A. B. Leach & Co., Rogers Caldwell & Co., and William R. Compton Co., put out statements which were totally misleading and in some respects false, in order to secure the sale of these bonds. With this legislation in effect that sort of thing will not be possible. If it is done, those responsible for it will be held responsible, both in the civil and criminal courts.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. I have not the time to go into the details of this bill and to make a close analysis of the different provisions of it, but I do want to call attention to one feature of it about which there were some differences of opinion in the subcommittee. I will say at the outset that I was the only member of the subcommittee which took the view which I am going to dwell upon.

I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska for a brief question.

Mr. HOWARD. I am in hearty sympathy with the gentleman's views regarding this rule. The gentleman has great regret that the rule has been brought in here. I have still greater regret than his own. My great regret is that the Democratic Rules Committee has seen fit to follow a precedent established by the committee connected with the gentleman's own party for 10 long years. I join in his protest against the rule.

Mr. MAPES. I cannot yield any further for a discussion of the rule. I am sorry. I yielded for a question and not for a statement. It is possible that the gentleman is misconstruing some precedent to which he has referred, or his recollection about it may possibly be faulty.

The particular point of the bill to which I was about to call attention is the difference between the House bill and the bill reported by the committee of the Senate, and the original draft of the legislation which accompanied the President's message and which was introduced in the House of Representatives, as to the liability of the directors of issuing corporations, for false statements which are made in the registration statement filed with the Federal Trade Commission, and upon which the innocent investing public has relied in putting its money into securities.

I have taken so much time with the interruptions that I will not have time to go into this matter in detail, but the Senate committee in its report states the question at issue this way:

The question is whether ignorance of an untruth should excuse the director and leave the loss upon the buyer. To do so, in our opinion, would fail to give the buyer the needed relief and fail to restore confidence. If one of two presumably innocent persons must bear a loss, it is familiar legal principle that he should bear it who has the opportunity to learn the truth and has allowed untruths to be published and relied upon. Moreover, he should suffer the loss who occupies a position of trust in the issuing corporation toward the stockholders, rather than the buyer of stock who must rely upon what he is told. * * *

If a director can excuse himself by saying that he has in good faith relied upon an accountant's statement, or the statement of some other person, then the investor will continue in the same position from which the Nation is struggling to extricate him. It has been stated in prospectuses repeatedly that the information given is believed by the company to be true, but not guaranteed.

Let me say that the original draft as introduced in the House contained a provision which made directors responsible and liable to the investing public for the return of its money if misstatements of material facts were made or if there were any omissions of material facts in this statement which is required to be filed with the Federal Trade Commission. That has been changed in the bill as reported by the committee so that a director, if he shows that he exercised reasonably good faith and believed that the statements were true, or that no omission to give material facts had been made, then he is not liable. I may say that the issuer himself in all such cases is responsible for the return of the money to an innocent investor if he desires to rescind his contract. That is a good provision and has a tendency to some extent to take care of the situation which I have in mind. The directors, however, are not responsible if they can show the exercise of good faith and reasonable diligence. It seems to some of us that, as between directors and the innocent investing public, that the directors should be held civilly liable as well.

Let me say that among those appearing before the committee who entertained this view were Mr. Houston Thompson, former member of the Federal Trade Commission, who had a great deal to do with preparing the original draft of the bill; Mr. Walter L. Miller, Chief of the Foreign Service of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce of the Department of Commerce; Mr. Ollie M. Butler, an attorney in the same Department, who also had to do with the drafting of the original bill; and Mr. Robert E. Healy, chief counsel of the Federal Trade Commission, who has been conducting the public-utility investigations. They all testified they thought the original draft in this respect should be adopted rather than the draft of the committee. Their testimony to this effect is in the printed hearings. I am taking the liberty of quoting from a statement which Mr. Butler made to the subcommittee, which does not appear in the printed hearings, although it expresses the same thought as his statement which will be found in the hearings. He said in this statement to the subcommittee:

The differences between the draft submitted by the President and the one now before the committee are clear cut. All arguments in support of the original draft must necessarily favor the investor. All those in support of the new draft must necessarily be to the advantage of the director.

Stripped of legal phraseology the original bill proposes that if the directors of a company misstate a material fact they shall give the purchaser's money back to him, even though the directors, in the exercise of due diligence, did not know the statement of that fact to be untrue. Give the purchaser's money back—not the vendors' money—for it was never rightfully theirs.

The new draft proposes that, even if the directors make a mistake about a material fact, they shall retain the purchaser's money with all their incidental profits, if upon the exercise of reasonable care they believed the statements to be true. We are discussing ascertainable facts—not opinions or expectancies concerning which both drafts are silent.

Mr. Butler continues:

In the heart of New York's financial district the Wall Street Journal approvingly said that "the measure aims to deprive caveat emptor of any usefulness it may have had or may have been thought to have had in the justification of smoothly deceptive practices. The heart of this measure is that it links full disclosure of pertinent facts respecting a security, offering to pertinent responsibility that can be definitely placed."

The same view was taken editorially by almost every paper in the United States. The Dallas (Tex.) News, for example, took issue with the defense of the old regime offered by Seligman, the eminent investment lawyer, by saying:

"Surely there can be no question as to who should sustain the loss for misrepresentation of fact in security marketing, whether willful or mistaken. The investor can rely only on the efficiency of the directors; the latter should be able to protect themselves."

The Christian Science Monitor, recognized as a fair cross section of the country, expressed itself much more strongly. It said:

"Too long has high finance been low business. * * * For a horse trade where the buyer has full opportunity to examine his purchase, 'Let the buyer beware', was a good rule. * * * When to the natural complexities of pyramiding holding companies is added the wizardry and worse of some types of financial priestcraft, even the most alert buyer has little chance."

It should be kept in mind that no one is asked to guarantee the success of any enterprise. He is only asked to tell the truth about existing facts. If he makes the statement that he is organizing a company to drill oil wells and so states, that is a perfectly fair statement, and everybody who puts money into the proposition takes his chances and has no redress even though nothing but dry wells are found; but if a misstatement relative to a material fact is made, then it seemed to some of us that the members of the board of directors ought to be held responsible as against the rights of the innocent investors who made their investments relying upon such statements even though the directors acted in good faith.

Mr. Healy stated the matter before the committee in this way. I quote from page 245 of the hearings:

I can only interpret the philosophy of this bill as it appeals to me. The philosophy of this bill is that where the director has made a mistake, and the purchaser has not made any, except to buy the security, that the responsibility falls on the seller. Let the seller beware. The purchaser has not made any mistake, but the director has made one, no matter how honest a mistake it may be, but he has made a mistake, and it has resulted in somebody else's disadvantage.

Now, under the terms of this bill, the philosophy of this bill, if interpreted correctly, why should not the responsibility be upon the seller?

Let me ask you: Suppose you and I were in partnership, and I made a mistake or I was guilty of fraud within the scope of the partnership business, and you knew nothing whatever about it. I think there is no doubt but that you would be liable civilly.

Again, Mr. Healy said:

If a director or an accountant has acted in good faith, and has actually made a mistake, his corporation has gotten some money from the sale of those securities as a result of that mistake.

In closing I should like to say this one thing more. The investing public should keep clearly in mind that this legislation does not contemplate that the Federal Trade Commission will attempt to pass upon the soundness or unsoundness of any security. The investor must do that for himself. It will make the material facts relating to any security available to him if he cares to investigate them, but he must exercise his own judgment as to the merits of the investment. The bill expressly provides that it shall be unlawful for anyone to represent to a prospective purchaser that the Federal Trade Commission has in any way passed upon the merits or given approval to any security coming within the purview of the act. [Applause.]

Mr. POUL. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GREENWOOD].

Mr. GREENWOOD. Mr. Speaker, my study of this bill convinces me that there is no politics involved in the bill. I think all of us are agreed that a situation exists in the sale of securities in our country that calls for some reform and regulation.

I never have read a bill that appeared to be more carefully drawn, with reference to all of its features and technicalities, than this bill. I am informed that the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce itself and through its subcommittee, has spent a great deal of time and careful thought and has called before it many experts as draftsmen students of economy, commerce, and banking and that they used more care upon particular features of this bill than any bill that has come before the House in many a day.

The bill uses the commerce clause of the Constitution conferring power upon Congress to regulate through interstate agencies of communication the sale of securities. All lines of publicity, whether by use of the mails, the telegraph, the telephone, radio, prospectuses, or any other form of publicity that will lead an investor to purchase securities have been covered by this bill.

This bill should not be mutilated or garbled by amendments that have not been thought out; and I take it that we legislate in this House largely through our committees. The majority party is simply expressing its confidence in this committee and the subcommittee that have drawn this particularly technical bill by giving them the special authority of amending the bill, allowing abundance of time for debate—5 hours in addition to the rule—in which all phases of the bill will be explained.

The House retains its privilege of adopting or rejecting the rule or of accepting or rejecting the bill as written. The bill is directed to transactions that reach out into every nook and corner of our land. Wherever there are savings accounts, wherever people invest their funds in postal savings, building and loan companies, or in banks they have suffered because of lack of information concerning investments that have been recommended to them—very often by their bankers who thought they were recommending with full faith and understanding securities both foreign and domestic—this measure will afford protection. These investments have drained funds from local saving accounts through the channels of banking and have taken them into the metropolitan centers, there to be invested in securities many times that were worth scarcely more than the paper they were written upon.

Commercial banking has been confused with investment banking. International bankers and investment bankers in the cities have sent out their lines of contact with every bank in America. By that contact, by their high-powered salesmen, and by their publicity they have induced these corresponding banks to take allotments of investments, and oftentimes the local bankers in good faith have taken them solely on the word of the investment banker and the international banker as to the worth and value of the securities. So instead of confining their efforts to commercial banking, they have gone into this field of investment banking or sent their money to the financial centers to be invested in securities. They have failed to use their funds locally for the needs of the community and its industries; they have failed to put it into the channels of trade and deprived the local community of the money because an opportunity to make profits has been offered to peddle questionable securities.

The time has come when the full light of publicity must be thrown upon these transactions of promoting sales of these securities and the manner in which they are sold, so that the investor may know more about the value of the security he is buying.

It has been said that we have drifted into a gambler's civilization, in which men are no longer inclined to invest their money in proven and honest business; but, believing they can make more money in the negotiation and sale of securities, sometimes upon a margin and upon a basis of gambling, our whole financial system has taken on the psychology of gambling instead of honest methods of banking and industry.

So publicity concerning investments will have a wholesome psychological effect in every community and many of these banks will cease their high-powered promotion in connection with big city banks, which procedure in the past has induced their depositors to send their funds out of the communities where funds should remain to assist local enterprise.

If there is any one thing that has destroyed confidence in the banking system of America it is this system of gambling in securities. The channels of publicity I have outlined, the forms of contact, and the use of high-powered salesmen have resulted in the people losing their savings in large part and even their confidence in their local bankers.

So the necessity for this legislation to help restore confidence in our local banking institutions is great. These practices must stop. The President of the United States called attention to this in a special message. We are attempting here to reform these crooked methods.

There is a peculiar fact with respect to such investments in that the corporation that issues the securities knows more about them than anyone else, and the old rule of caveat emptor, or the buyer beware, certainly should not apply to this character of investments. The man who sells them ought to give all the facts, and the Government ought to require the issuer of securities to give all the facts, and be honest with the public.

This is the purpose of the legislation, so that every investor may know more about the assets behind the securities, the practices of the corporation issuing the securities, the motives that are behind the negotiating bank, whether it is a promoter who wants to make a commission rather than to serve the public in an honest way or not. These are the facts that the American people are entitled to know not only to save the investment funds of the small investor but to restore confidence in the banking system of America.

I think this panic has demonstrated one fact, that we have one of the worst banking systems in the world, because many of the leading bankers of the country no longer have the old-time sense of ethics that the bankers of a former generation had. The banker has become so impersonal in dealing with the public that he no longer has a strict sense of ethics or pays attention to the strict detail of honest business like the bankers of a former day. The investment bankers send their men out and they are none too particular in telling the small banks or the investors all the facts concerning the investments they are peddling over the country. The sale of such securities has reached the point where it is a scandal and a gigantic racket in America, and the Federal Government is the agency to stop it.

No State has power to control publicity of securities. Some issues come from abroad, some of them are national in character, and no State has such authority or power. It is the duty of the Federal Government, using the commerce clause of the Constitution and the mails, to compel these investment bankers to lay their cards on the table and to show all the facts concerning the securities they are asking the American people to buy.

Mr. MOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENWOOD. I yield.

Mr. MOTT. Did I understand the gentleman to say that no blue-sky law would prohibit the advertising of a foreign security within the State where these advertisements are printed?

Mr. GREENWOOD. No; that was not my statement. I say this system of sale is Nation-wide, and, perhaps, there is a different blue-sky law in every State, and some States have none, and, therefore, there ought to be uniform security for every investor in America, and the Federal Government is the power that can provide this uniform system of protection. The States can assist and support the Federal Government.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENWOOD. I yield.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. You cannot have such uniformity if you incorporate in this bill in section 18 the blue-sky law of the various States, because each State has its own particular blue-sky law. I agree with most of what the gentleman has said here, but if you pass this rule in its present form, there will be no opportunity to eliminate from the bill section 18, which, in my judgment, is absolutely vicious.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. POUL. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHANNON].

Mr. SHANNON. Mr. Speaker, there is not a Member of this House on either side whose heart is not in sympathy with remedial legislation along the lines proposed in this measure.

However, we are now confronted with a rule, an unnecessary one, a gag rule, which permits amendments to be offered only by the committee which has had the bill under consideration. We cannot even offer an amendment to the amendments offered by the committee on the floor.

If I am a reader of the hearts of men, the heart of the Chairman of the Rules Committee is not for these rules that he brings in here day after day.

We are absolutely in the position of the striker in an old-fashioned blacksmith shop. In the blacksmith shop of old, the master smith took his light hammer in one hand and his tongs in the other, and by gentle movements of the hammer he directed the striker, who struck the powerful blows that finally welded into form the work of the shop.

This House is made the striker. We drive these measures through by our votes, as shown in the RECORD. The master smith is the committee, which directs the work, aided, too frequently, by the soft, velvety, and unseen hand of those backing the measure.

The strikers in this congressional shop are given another duty of the striker in the blacksmith shop. By 5 hours' debate we do the work of furnishing the hot air for the bellows; the more we pump the greater the heat to pass a measure we are not permitted to amend, even to the extent of dotting an "i" or crossing a "t", and yet this is called "deliberative legislation."

The gentleman who just left the floor said we had 5 hours to debate this measure. There you have it; we can blow hot and cold on this measure for 5 hours after adopting this infamous rule. [Laughter and applause.]

There is but one man in this House who, year after year, has stood and voted against gag rules whenever offered, and by whichever side offered. I refer to the distinguished gentleman from Nebraska, who got his doctrines from the great leader of the people, William J. Bryan, whose companion and associate he was for many years. Mr. Bryan believed that the people should rule, and not cliques or coteries, either within or without legislative bodies. I am proud that we have in this House Mr. EDGAR HOWARD, who has voted against every gag rule that has come up since he has been a Member of this body. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. KENNEY].

Mr. KENNEY. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of this rule, and I believe every other Member of the House favors it, although there are some who will not admit their approval.

The Federal Securities Act comes here after long and industrious work by the committee which has dealt with it. The committee has given it the greatest and most careful consideration. Its members have spared no effort to present a satisfactory measure. The chairman of the committee, for his particular zeal and industry, is deserving of the utmost commendation.

Now, there is on matter I should like to invite to the attention of the House. In our zeal for the public we must not overlook the protection of advantages now accruing to the employees of many of our great industries. And it is these advantages that I wish to preserve to the employees of the Nation by an amendment which I shall later ask unanimous consent to offer.

In section 4, subdivision (3), of the bill it is provided that the transaction exempted from the provisions of the bill shall include—

* * * the issuance of additional capital stock of a corporation sold or distributed by it among its own stockholders exclusively, where no commission or other remuneration is paid or given, directly or indirectly, in connection with the sale or distribution of such increased capital stock * * *

I should, therefore, like to recommend an amendment, which would insert before the word "stockholders" the words "employees or", so as to assure to employees consideration upon the sale or distribution of stock by the corporation to its own stockholders.

Otherwise a corporation inclined to include its employees in an offer of stock to its own stockholders might disregard its employees, because an issuance to them would not be exempted by the provisions of the act.

We all know that our great American public, by investment, has built up our great industries. We know, too, that the employees of our industries have invested in their own enterprises by purchasing out of their wages stock offered to them by their employers on favorable terms. We must preserve the rights and advantages now enjoyed by the employees of our industries. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH].

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, ladies and gentlemen of the House, I regret that it was necessary for the Rules Committee to bring in this rule depriving the Members of an opportunity to offer amendments. But I have been for many years vitally interested in legislation of this kind. Three years ago, and again 2 years ago, I pleaded with the committee to give favorable consideration to my bill to regulate the stock exchanges and the issuance and sale of stock.

I realize that there is no perfection in anything and that this proposed legislation is, after all, a compromise. This bill does not go as far as I had hoped it would go. I should like to see included in this bill a provision that would apply not only to the stocks that will be listed but to all stocks that have been listed on the many stock exchanges in the United States.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. I cannot yield. We have today millions upon millions of shares of stock outstanding that were at the time of listing of questionable value and are now of no value at all, but that are still being manipulated in. The gentlemen who control and manipulate the stock exchanges, hungry as they are for profit and more profit, have listed stocks that should never have been listed, and they will continue for many years to unload worthless stocks upon the American people until we pass a law that will prevent them from perpetrating the frauds that have been practiced upon the people of this Nation for many years. [Applause.]

During the years 1928 and 1929 they listed over 300 different stocks, the majority of which should not have been listed. Yet not only did they do that but they issued false statements to induce people to invest their entire savings in these securities, knowing full well that the securities were worthless and that they were committing fraud upon the Nation.

We are today a nation suffering from the misdeeds of these investment bankers and crooked manipulators on the stock exchanges. I had hoped that we would enact a bill at this time that would forever prevent dishonest listings and transactions. But unfortunately the committee came to the conclusion that at this time they could not do it all in one bill. Consequently I am in favor of this proposed legislation, although I deplore the lack of the provision I mentioned. I believe this measure will remedy to some extent the evils that have been practiced by these dishonest bankers and unprincipled manipulators on the stock exchange.

But I renew the notice that I served on the House three and a half years ago that I will not desist until these invidious and thoroughly reprehensible practices of short selling, "selling against the box", and floor trading are abolished.

Mr. Speaker, ladies and gentlemen, I am satisfied that if my advice had been heeded and my bill and resolution adopted in 1929 the liquidation of securities then, though necessarily severe, due to the criminal inflation, would never have reached the catastrophic proportions of that in the last 3 years that has brought about a terrific loss in all property value, that has closed thousands of banks, that has forced tens of thousands of small merchants into bankruptcy, and that has thrown 15,000,000 people out of employment. [Applause.]

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I feel constrained to say a word in conclusion. We have here a measure which will be passed by this House with probably very few dissenting votes. And yet we have had the usual complaint about gag rules.

I believe the country is more concerned about what we do than about the way we do it, and I believe that the country is more concerned about the results of our deliberations here than about the way that measures are considered. During this session already quite a number of great measures have been passed. So far as I can judge, the country almost unanimously approves these measures. And yet we have heard someone complain about gag rules whenever these measures were presented to the House. I believe the country is practically unanimous behind this measure, and I believe that when it becomes law there will be very little thought given to whether or not Mr. A from this State or Mr. B from some other State had opportunity to offer amendment. With the Nation facing imminent complete economic breakdown our people demanded action, prompt action. This House has responded. It will hardly be denied that the Nation approves what we have done.

I demand the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 5480) to provide full and fair disclosure of the character of securities sold in interstate and foreign commerce and through the mails, and to prevent frauds in the sale thereof, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H.R. 5480, with Mr. ARNOLD in the chair.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the first reading of the bill will be dispensed with.

There was no objection.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 30 minutes. Before I begin my remarks I feel I must acknowledge gratefully the cooperation of the subcommittee that worked upon this bill and of the 24 members of the committee who worked unselfishly and diligently and patriotically to try to bring in a bill that would meet the hopes that were raised by the President's message and that would cure a situation which has become absolutely intolerable in this country.

I would not feel that I was doing justice to myself or to the committee if I did not also make the same grateful acknowledgment to some gentlemen who have patriotically and unselfishly worked with us. Mr. Houston Thompson, a former member of the Federal Trade Commission, now a resident of the city of Washington, did splendid service upon this bill. Judge Healy and Mr. Miller, of the Federal Trade Commission, also gave their time and talent without stint. Mr. Butler and Mr. Miller, of the Department of Commerce, also gave their time and talent. Mr. Felix Frankfurter, of the Harvard Law School, whose name is known all over the country, and also Mr. James M. Landis, of the Harvard Law School, and Mr. Benjamin N. Cohen, a splendid lawyer of New York, who sat with us during all of the sessions of the committee, gave their splendid talent to us, also Messrs. Beeman and Perley, of the Legislative Counsel, did their usual efficient work.

I am compelled to do something today that I do not usually do, and that is ask the indulgence of the House while I read at least a part of my remarks. I have been with this matter for 3 weeks, day and night, and, frankly, I am just a little tired. If gentlemen will bear with me until I can give them the background and some of the conditions that have grown up in this country which call for this legislation without interruption, then I shall be very glad to answer any questions I can about this very technical measure. In the 20 years that I have been a Member of Congress I have dealt with matters touching interstate commerce. When you deal with matters affecting interstate commerce in transportation you do so with a law that has been upon the statute books for more than 40 years. You have the decisions of the courts as your chart, and you have the decisions of the Interstate Commerce Commission and of the various State commissions. With this bill we are embarking upon a practically new and untried sea; and, as I say, since I have been a Member of Congress, this is the most technical matter with which I have ever been called upon to deal.

The first permanent settlement of English-speaking people in Virginia was accomplished through a joint-stock company. The successors of these early Colonies, through a series of amazing adventures, have wrested a continent from the aborigines, have explored and utilized its natural resources until more than a hundred million people comprise the citizenship of this Republic. The initiative, self-reliance, inventive genius, organizing ability, and industry of the people who have occupied this continent have created a national wealth of some $300,000,000,000.

The production and distribution of goods by the Americans have given rise to new institutions and to many refinements and new uses of old methods. The corporation has reached a development and has been put to uses never dreamed of by the adventurers who united their slender capital in a joint-stock company to found a colony in the wilderness of Virginia.

The conquest of this continent was made by individual human beings, each pursuing his own happiness in his own way. There was impatience with restraint. Rugged individualism characterized the pioneer. Thomas Jefferson and Andrew Jackson, the idols of frontiersmen, were trusted and followed as they taught that the best government is the least government. Those were the days of a self-reliant agricultural people. During the past 75 years this country has experienced an industrial revolution. Through corporations, great aggregations of capital have been assembled to build railroads, develop mines, fell forests, fabricate goods, and finally to carry on the ordinary processes of merchandising.

The early corporations were in each case composed of a few stockholders who contributed to a joint fund. These stockholders never traded in their own stock. The corporations usually were closed. If the ventures were successful, the profits were divided between those who contributed the capital; if unsuccessful, the contributors of the capital lost what they had risked—that is, the amount they had paid into the capital stock. As corporations became older, as their founders died, as their operations became more extensive, as they came to demand increasing and frequent additions of capital, their stockholders ceased to be a few fellow adventurers known to each other and became a multitude. The relations between the stockholder and the corporation ceased to be personal and became impersonal.

The thousands of stockholders of a great corporation have come to trust implicitly the board of directors. The directorates have come to be composed of men who sit on many such boards. In our investigation of the stock ownership and control of railroads, we found that the chairman of the board of one railroad was a director in some 70 other corporations. In such a situation—and this is rather typical—the board of directors have to rely on the officials of the corporation. Where the stock is widely distributed, as is the case of so many American corporations, the officials of a company, through the use of proxies and of the advantage they have in obtaining proxies, are able to continue in office without much regard to their efficiency. The proof is that when a corporation goes into receivership some official of the corporation is usually appointed receiver. Two hundred companies own 25 percent of the total wealth of the United States. We have in this country more than 300,000 corporations. The total assets of all nonbanking corporations in 1930 have been estimated at $165,000,000,000. (American Economic Review, March 1931, pp. 15 and 16.) The combined assets of the 200 largest of these corporations amounted in 1930 to $81,000,000,000. That is, 200 big corporations control half of the wealth of all the nonbanking companies. Two hundred companies have as much assets as the more than 300,000 smaller companies. When we look to the New York Stock Exchange, we find that 130 of the largest companies control more than four fifths of all the assets of all the companies represented by securities listed by the exchange.

To indicate the importance to the American people of stocks and bonds, we merely have to call to mind that 75 percent, probably 80 percent, of American business wealth is owned and controlled by corporations and that 200 of the biggest corporations control 40 percent or more of all business wealth. In 1928 the National Industrial Conference Board estimated that the total national wealth was $360,000,000,000. In this wealth is included agricultural land and improvements, residential real estate, personal property including automobiles, and a large volume of Government property. In agriculture the corporation is still relatively unimportant. Yet when we consider the total national wealth, we find that 200 corporations control roughly one fourth of the total wealth of this country. To recapitulate, 200 of our biggest companies out of more than 300,000 corporations control one fourth of the total national wealth, two fifths of the business wealth other than banking, one half of the corporate wealth, and more than four fifths of the wealth represented by the securities traded in on the stock exchange. The influence of these 200 big companies is not limited to themselves. They dominate or in some measure determine the policies of many of the smaller corporations. About 2,000 individuals making up the dominant directors and officials of our largest corporations really control or dominate more than one half of the industry of this country.

During the past 10 years the big corporations have grown in size much more rapidly than the smaller companies. Further, to illustrate the rapidity of the growth of our big corporations, the National Industrial Conference Board—in its bulletin no. 30, published February 25, 1930—estimated an increase between 1922 and 1928 in the national wealth of 12½ percent as compared with an increase in the assets of 200 of the largest corporations of 45 percent. That is, while the national wealth was increasing at an annual rate of 2 percent, the assets of 200 big companies was increasing at an annual rate of 6 percent. A list of these 200 non-banking corporations may be found in a book by Berle and Means entitled "The Modern Corporation and Private Property", page 19.

In 1800 the corporation was used in this country mainly for undertakings of public interest, such as the construction of turnpikes, bridges, and canals, and the operation of banks and insurance companies. Up to 1800, 355 profit-seeking corporations had been formed in the United States. Today we have a thousand corporations for one that existed in 1800. The operation of half of our industry is now in the hands of 200 companies. This concentration has brought a change in the character of competition, and production is carried on under the ultimate control of a very few individuals. What is of great concern is that the value of tangible goods is becoming increasingly dependent upon these corporate organizations.

With the concentration of the ownership of our national wealth in corporations there has also developed a dispersion of stock ownership. Of 144 companies out of the 200 largest corporations in this country, 20 each had less than 5,000 stockholders, 71 companies each had over 20,000 stockholders, and more than one half of the assets belonging to the 200 largest corporations were held by companies each with 50,000 stockholders or more. These 144 largest companies whose stock lists have been examined reported 5,800,000 stockholders of record. According to an investigation made by your Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, under authority given by this House, it was found that the largest stockholding of the Santa Fe Railroad was only three fourths of 1 percent of the total and there were over 59,000 stockholders. The largest holding of the Southern Pacific Co. was 1.65 percent of the total and there were over 65,000 stockholders. The largest holding of the Southern Railway Co. was 1.9 percent of the total and there were over 20,000 stockholders. The largest holding of the Baltimore & Ohio was 2½ percent of the total and there were nearly 40,000 stockholders. In 1931 the Pennsylvania Railroad reported more than 240,000 shareholders of record; the United States Steel Corporation, 174,500; the American Telephone & Telegraph, 642,000.

The managements of these big corporations, as a rule, own an insignificant percentage of the outstanding voting stock. For example, the management of 44 steam railroads owns only 1.2 percent of the common stock, the management of 22 gas companies owns only 1.4 percent of the common stock, the management of 36 mining corporations owns only 1.8 percent of the common stock, the management of 378 transportation and public utility companies owns only 1.2 percent of the common stock, the management of 46 electric light and power companies owns only about 4 percent of the common stock, the management of 102 telephone companies owns only about 5 percent of the common stock, the management of 53 petroleum mining companies owns only about 5 percent of the common stock, the management of 43 coal mining companies owns only 8 percent of the common stock, the management of 1,363 manufacturing companies owns only about 15 percent of the common stock, the management of 4,367 corporations engaged in all sorts of industries owns less than 11 percent of the common stock.

It is estimated that in 1928 there were 18,000,000 stockholders of corporations in the United States. This is an increase of about 50 percent over 1920. Much of this increase in numbers has been due, in a very large measure, to the sale of securities to customers and to employees of corporations.

Merely to bring home to the Members of this House the great importance of supervising trading in the securities of corporations, in the interest of honesty and fair dealing, I will give you some figures compiled in 1922. The total par value of outstanding stock in mining and quarrying in 1922 was $8,775,000,000, and the estimated number of stockholders of record was 2,000,000. Of manufacturing corporations, the par value of outstanding stock in 1922 was estimated at $3,400,000,000, with over 3,000,000 stockholders of record. In transportation, the total par value of outstanding stock was $17,532,000,000, with 3,293,000 stockholders, of which the steam railroads had $8,600,000,000 par value of stock, with 965,000 stockholders. As a further illustration of the importance of corporation securities to American investors, it has been estimated that in 1922, 54 percent of the reported income from investment was received from corporate securities, and in 1927, 63 percent.

When we consider the welfare of our people the enacting of this bill into law seems imperative. Any casual consideration of the development of this country impresses on one that the size of our industrial unit is increasing, and with its growth there has come a dispersion in the ownership of the unit. Today an important part of the wealth of individual citizens consists of interest in great enterprises of which no single person owns a major portion. Today the owner does not possess actual physical properties but he holds a piece of paper which represents certain rights and expectations. But the owners of these pieces of paper have little control over the physical property; the owners of these pieces of paper carry no actual responsibility with respect to the enterprise or its physical property.

As Professor Berle so well says:

The spiritual values that formerly went with ownership have been separated from it. * * * Physical property capable of being shaped by its owner could bring to him direct satisfaction apart from the gain it yielded. * * * It represented an extension of his own personality. * * * This quality has been lost to the property owner.

Again the value of the wealth of a particular person is coming more and more to depend on forces beyond his own reach and control. The wealth of the individual is represented by securities subject to the great swings in the appraisal by society of its own immediate future. Wealth in this form can be directly enjoyed by its owner in a less and less degree. Only through sale in the market can the owner obtain direct use of his wealth. In other words, the owner of securities is chained to the market. The purpose of this bill is to place the owners of securities on a parity, so far as is possible, with the management of the corporations, and to place the buyer on the same plane so far as available information is concerned, with the seller. Many of us in this House come from small communities where most of the wealth consists of real estate and improvements. In such a situation, the corporation is of importance only as our constituents purchase and consume the products and services of corporate endeavor. Those in this House who come from industrial centers, from the so-called "metropolitan areas" in which we have permitted an amazing concentration of activity, are familiar with the fact that today the owner of shares in a corporation possesses a mere symbol of ownership, while the power, the responsibility, and the substance which have characterized ownership in the past have been transferred to a separate group which holds control. It is for the protection of these 18 million owners of symbols that this bill has been drawn.

We have, on the one hand, 18,000,000 passive citizens having no actual contact with their companies; on the other hand, a few hundred powerful managers directing and controlling the destinies of the companies and the physical properties which they own. The owners of these symbols are entitled to know what the symbols represent. Those who are interested in purchasing these pieces of paper have the right to demand information as to the actual condition of the issuing company. Up to this time such information has depended on the grace of an intrenched management. These managers are truly trustees. One of their duties as trustees is to furnish security owners, in being and in prospect, with reliable information. This bill has been drawn to enforce that responsibility.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there for the purpose of giving us his definition of the word "management"?

Mr. RAYBURN. The ones in active control—the president, the vice president, and the board of directors.

A few individuals really control the destinies of these companies. Millions of people own the stocks and bonds of the corporations; that is to say, the actual wealth, the physical property, the mines, the railroads, the ships, the factories, the warehouses, the office buildings, the gold in the vaults of the central banks, the raw materials awaiting the processing of the manufacturer, the finished products in the warehouse or in transit are owned in most cases by corporations. The rank and file of the people possess stocks and bonds; that is, evidences of a share in equities or of a claim in the event of corporate failure.

The conditions under which these stocks and bonds are issued have been those of the greatest freedom. P. T. Barnum once remarked that the American people pay to be gulled. Millions of citizens have been swindled into exchanging their savings for worthless stocks. The fraudulent promoter has taken an incredible toll from confiding people. So-called "blue sky laws" have been passed by the States in an effort to arrest the predatory promoter and outright swindler.

May I say right in this connection that the bill as proposed by the committee preserves the jurisdiction of the States' securities commissions to regulate transactions within the States. We think it is proper to uphold the laws of the States and by this measure we prohibit the sale through the instrumentality of interstate commerce or by the mails of a security, the sale of which is unlawful in that State. Upon this section of the bill two members of the committee filed a minority report. The other members of the committee cannot agree with their reasoning. We not only believe that Congress has the power to enact such a provision but we believe that it is only just that we should do so.

This bill is not so much a response to the frauds of criminals as it is to the reticence of financiers. Today we are forced to recognize that the hired managers of great corporations are not as wise, not as conservative, and sometimes are not as trustworthy as millions of American investors have been persuaded to believe. During the last 12 years, an era that is falsely designated as one of prosperity, American people lost perhaps a hundred billion dollars through the purchase of stocks and bonds. This catastrophe so colossal as to stagger the imagination did not come upon our people through the machinations of the common fraud. This loss of an amount equal to perhaps a third of the total national wealth did not follow from the kind of confidence game against which parents warn their sons. It came through the leadership that the average investor had a right to believe that he could trust. These securities were peddled among the people by firms like Halsey, Stuart & Co. and by great financial houses like the National City Bank.

Through the deliberate action of the hired officials of our greatest corporations, we have had during the past 15 years an amazing inflation of credit. The printing press has been used to turn out bright new stock certificates to distribute among the stockholders. These new stocks have been distributed as dividends, have been impounded to support issues of bonds. These bonds have been offered over the counter of every bank in exchange for the savings and surplus funds of depositors. The printing presses were not slowed down until the market for securities was paralyzed through the literal impoverishment of millions of people. More than $200,000,000,000 in bonds were issued and sold and are now outstanding. Hundreds of billions of stock were sold, not as offerings in highly speculative enterprises, but they were represented to be evidences of valuable equities in established and going concerns. As the result of this bald inflation directed by the hired managers of our big corporations, we have bonds outstanding almost to the amount of the actual wealth of this country. This orgy of inflation has imposed upon the physical properties of this country fixed charges far beyond the present productive capacity of the country to meet. This unbridled expansion has rendered the stocks almost worthless. A friend of mine, the other day, showed me a list of holdings which within the past few years had been purchased for $165,000 in cash. Last week when we were going over the list, the value according to the quotations of the day was less than $25,000.

These hired officials of our great corporations who permitted, who promoted, who achieved the extravagant expansion of the financial structure of their respective companies today present a pitiable spectacle. Five years ago they arrogated to themselves the greatest privileges. They scorned the interference of the Government. They dealt with their stockholders in the most arbitrary fashion. They called upon the people to bow down to them as the real rulers of the country. Safe from the pitiless publicity of Government supervision, unrestrained by Federal statute, free from any formal control, these few men, proud, arrogant, and blind, drove the country to financial ruin. Some of them are fugitives from justice in foreign lands; some of them have committed suicide; some of them are under indictment; some of them are in prison; all of them are in terror of the consequences of their own deeds.

This bill is drawn to enable a would-be purchaser of a bond or of a stock to require some information from the officials of the issuing company. The financial statements of the most conservative and the most reputable of our corporations are more mystifying than enlightening. The average stockholder cannot tell much about the condition of his company from the statements he receives. The inquiring investor has been able to get little except blurbs. This bill undertakes to define the duty of officers of corporations issuing securities, of syndicates underwriting issues, the duties of these corporate officials to the investing public. It undertakes to fix responsibility for information.

As set forth fully in the report, this bill prohibits the sale of securities in interstate commerce which are not registered with the Federal Trade Commission. The registration statement must contain complete information and all facts asked for under schedule A to be found in the last pages of the bill. If the Commission finds that any of the questions asked, or information demanded, are not full and complete, they have the authority to refuse registration. If after registration it is discovered that the registration statement omits to state any material fact or makes a false statement, the Commission may issue a stop order, and the security can only be sold after issuance of the stop order in violation of the laws and subjects the seller to both civil and criminal liability.

The prospectus or advertisement of the security, if it is more than a mere announcement of the name and price of the issue offered, must include any part of the matter contained in the registration statement which the Commission, in its discretion, may require. The purpose of this section is to insure that prospective buyers of securities may have a complete understanding of the transaction in which they are invited to participate.

Let me repeat that what we seek to attain by this enactment is to make available to the prospective purchaser, if he is wise enough to use it, all information that is pertinent that would put him on notice and on guard, and then let him beware. On the other hand, we demand of the seller that he give full and complete information with reference to the security offered, under penalty of both civil and criminal liability if he evades or conceals material facts. If the seller is a wise man he will also beware. The people expect the Government of the United States to be clean. They expect the men who run it to be clean. This must be so if the people are to have confidence in, and respect for, their Government and fight in peace and in war to preserve it. Their Representatives have the right to demand that the men who run the business of the country shall conduct a clean business, to be fair and honorable with the other people of the country. In this bill we demand not only a new deal, we also demand a square deal. Less than this no honest man expects nor a dishonest man should have. When a people's faith is shaken in a business the business becomes halting and lame; when a people lose faith and confidence in the men who administer government it follows as the night the day they lose faith in government. Only one thing can follow in the wake in this destroyed confidence, that is, lack of support; and in its wake must follow the evils that attend socialism, bolshevism, and communism. We have reached the time in this country when we need the best brains and the greatest patriotism of large business, small business, the little man, big man, and all Americans who love the flag, to protect and defend their institutions if they are in these awful times to be preserved. [Applause.]

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RAYBURN. I believe the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KELLER] was on his feet first, but let me say about yielding, that there are other gentlemen on the subcommittee who are very able to discuss this, as well as other gentlemen on the committee who want some time. If I take too much time, it would do them a great injustice. I should be very glad to yield during the few minutes remaining that I have allotted to myself.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, does the requirement of registration apply to stocks already listed on the stock exchange or only to new stock?

Mr. RAYBURN. New stocks.

Mr. KELLER. Does the gentleman mean to say that all stocks now listed on all of the stock exchanges are entirely free from the operation of this law?

Mr. RAYBURN. They are to this extent: If a company has put its stock upon the market but goes out and buys that up and makes a new issue, then that new issue will come under the provisions of this bill. If a corporation had authorized an issue and had sold none of it and holds it in its treasury, that all comes under this bill. If it has sold 10 percent or 20 percent or 50 percent, what it still holds in its treasury is subject to the provisions of this bill.

Mr. KELLER. Why should it not apply to all stocks already issued?

Mr. RAYBURN. Frankly, the committee discussed that very thoroughly, and we doubt very seriously whether or not we can do that, and we doubt very seriously whether or not it would be very helpful in trying to gather up those stocks that are scattered throughout the country. In other words, there must be a provision in this bill somewhere that has to do with an isolated transaction. Otherwise we will follow those stocks through. This bill makes absolutely responsible the issuer, the underwriter, and the dealer. It makes him responsible civilly if he sells stocks upon a misrepresentation; it makes him guilty of fraud and criminally liable if he sells it with misrepresentation and fraudulent intent. We believed if we went as far as this bill goes, as far as we probably can go, we would have been challenged by lawyers throughout the country and the act would have been held up in the courts at a very early date. If we can from now on with the stocks that are issued, if we can from now on with the stocks that have been issued and not sold, if we can, when these great corporations go out and buy up their own stocks that they have distributed to the public and then reissue, if we can cover those things, our committee thought we were going a long way for one enactment, and that we had better try that out for a while before we entered the broader and more uncertain field.

Mr. KELLER. I can only say that I am sorry there is not some application made as to all stocks.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. I yield.

Mr. COX. I, of course, agree with the gentleman on the desirability of the things sought to be accomplished, but I wonder if the gentleman is prepared to discuss the question of the competency of Congress to do the things which are proposed in the resolution that is before us. For instance, I presume it is conceded that it is in the exercise of the commerce powers of the Constitution that this resolution comes to this House. As I understand from a hurried reading of the bill, it is proposed to extend that power beyond the point of where the courts have heretofore said an article becomes a part of commerce. In other words, the courts have held, without dissent, that no article is a part of commerce until it has entered the channel of commerce. Here it is proposed, as I take it from a reading of the bill, to reach back to the point of the preparation or production or manufacture of the article which is intended to be put into commerce.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has again expired.

Mr. RAYBURN. I yield myself 5 additional minutes, and then I will not take any further time.

Mr. COX. Is it the position of the gentleman that Congress has a right to supervise and control, or exercise any influence whatsoever, upon the formation of a corporation, which is a thing done entirely within the domain of the State?

Mr. RAYBURN. Not at all, and if a man does not intend to sell these securities in interstate commerce he is not compelled to register them.

Mr. COX. But does the gentleman contend that the mere intention to put his products in interstate commerce empowers the Congress to impose a condition that attaches then, and prior to the time the article does actually enter commerce?

Mr. RAYBURN. No; and that is not what this bill does.

Mr. COX. Then what does the language of section 20 mean?

Mr. RAYBURN. This bill says to the man who issues a security, "You may register that security; you are not compelled to register that security, but if you do not register it and you send it through interstate commerce we will penalize you."

Mr. COX. That, I understand, is probably within the power of Congress; but what is the meaning of the language in section 20?

Whenever it shall appear to the Commission, either upon complaint or otherwise, that the provisions of this act, or of any rule or regulation prescribed under authority thereof, have been or are about to be violated, it may, in its discretion, either require or permit such person to file with it a statement in writing, under oath—

And so forth. In other words, what is the meaning of the language "about to be violated" if it is not proposed in this resolution to extend the power of Congress to the point of the mere intention to do a certain thing which cannot, under the rulings of the court as heretofore held, be a part of commerce until it actually enters the channel of commerce?

Mr. RAYBURN. Well, if a man has any property in interstate commerce or the Commission decides he has made a false statement in his registration, and that the seller is making false representations in circulars that he is circulating—

Mr. COX. But is a mere circular, is a mere representation, commerce, within the meaning of the law?

Mr. RAYBURN. It is not commerce unless something you are selling in commerce attends it.

Mr. COX. But a mere representation, a mere prospectus, or a mere advertisement, is that property, in the sense that the advertisement represents something of value?

Mr. RAYBURN. If it travels in interstate commerce or through the mails I do not see any reason why the Congress has not the power to deal with it.

Mr. COX. Does not the gentleman see in this measure the projection of the Federal power, under Congress exercising its authority under the commerce clause to the point of uprooting and destroying all police power of States, insofar as the regulation of purely intrastate matters is concerned?

Mr. RAYBURN. No; because this bill specifically provides that nothing in this act shall be construed to in anywise interfere with any State law on this subject, but it goes farther than that and says that the States shall be protected, and that it shall be unlawful to ship into a State through the instrumentalities of interstate commerce or the mails, a security, the sale of which is prohibited in that State.

Mr. COX. But is it the contention of the gentleman that it is in the competency of Congress to confer any commerce powers upon a State?

Mr. RAYBURN. That is a moot question.

Mr. COX. It is not a moot question in law, but it may be moot here, as far as the attitude of the gentleman is concerned.

Mr. RAYBURN. I do not think we have to approach that in this bill. If the gentleman remembers the Reed law and the Webb-Kenyon law—

Mr. COX. The gentleman is here proceeding under the decision of the Court as set out in the Kansas Liquor case.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 2 additional minutes.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. I yield, for I have no doubt the gentleman is better informed on the law of this matter than I am.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I understood from the statement of my colleague that what is attempted to be done is the establishment of conditions precedent to engaging in interstate commerce.

Mr. RAYBURN. That is right.

Mr. COX. Of course it is within the power of Congress to fix a condition.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. A condition precedent.

Mr. COX. Yes; a condition precedent.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. As I understood my colleague, the intention was to undertake to establish regulatory conditions for engaging in the interstate commerce of securities.

Mr. RAYBURN. That is true.

Mr. COX. And merely gives the use of the instrumentalities of commerce upon the condition that these conditions have been complied with. It is not within the power of Congress to confer—

Mr. RAYBURN. That is exactly what this bill seeks to do. In effect it says to a man, "You do not have to register this security, but if you are going to sell it in interstate commerce, or through the mails, you will violate the law unless you do register."

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. PARKER of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 20 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, no one could possibly object to the principles set forth in this bill. There are certain clauses in the bill that I personally do not like.

This is the worst time in the history of the country to write a bill of this kind. As the gentleman from Texas so well said, this is the most intricate bill we have ever seen, and he and I have been members of the Committee on Interstate Commerce for the same length of time, 20 years.

This bill is written, and we cannot help it. It is written in the spirit of prejudice, because we have had before us in the past 3 or 4 years perfectly colossal, rotten failures in several large corporations and in several of the large banks of the country, which does not leave us in the proper mental attitude to write a bill of this magnitude and have it as clear as it should be. We are very apt to bend over backwards.

Two things must be considered in connection with this bill. We want to protect the gullible investor, the investor who has been imposed upon. This is tremendously important. But more important is the protection of the honest business man upon the success of whose business depends the success of the country. Under present conditions we are apt to think only of the man who has lost his money and not think of protecting the men who are trying to do business and do business honestly.

The gentleman from Michigan spoke about the directors being guarantors. The gentleman from Texas very emphatically brought out the small percentage of interest that the directors have in the large corporations.

For illustration, let us say you are a director of the United States Steel Corporation. It is nothing unusual for this corporation to bring out an issue of $10,000,000 of stock or debentures. If the directors of this company have got to be guarantors of every single statement that is made, nobody would sign the statement, because the directors cannot know. They must depend upon their accountants, their engineers, and their appraisers for statements.

Now, if they willfully make a misstatement, I am willing to go as far as anybody possibly could go. Send them to jail if the misstatement is willful. But if it is a statement founded on a mistake made by somebody else after the use of due diligence, I do not believe they should be held personally responsible.

Mr. COX. Is the gentleman conceding that the commerce clause of the Constitution confers upon Congress authority to carry the Federal power to the point of holding liable one who merely participates in the formation of a corporation within a State?

Mr. PARKER of New York. I am not. I am not discussing the constitutionality of it; I am discussing the wisdom of it.

Mr. COX. Does not the gentleman appreciate the fact that the extension of the principle announced in this bill simply means the swallowing up of the police power of the States by the Federal Government?

Mr. PARKER of New York. In answer I will simply say that the Senate bill does carry that absolute guaranty to the investor.

Mr. COX. Could not Congress accomplish what it seeks—that is, the full play of State laws—by making possible their application to all these matters, as it did when it made subject to State laws liquor transported within a State where traffic was prohibited?

Mr. PARKER of New York. That is an entirely different question.

Mr. COX. Certainly. This is the proposition: It is within the power of Congress to withdraw immunity from any article entering commerce which it may see fit to do, subjecting the article to the operation of State law.

Mr. PARKER of New York. Yes.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, that is not quite correct, I am sure. The gentleman has confined his question to intrastate business and not interstate business.

Mr. PARKER of New York. This law does not affect intrastate business in the least.

Mr. BRITTEN. Of course it does not, but the gentleman answered in the affirmative.

Mr. COX. Let me make this observation: It is within the power of Congress to declare that an article loses its interstate character upon entering a State where the article is under the condemnation of State law.

Mr. PARKER of New York. I will answer the gentleman in this way: If, in the gentleman's State, it is illegal to sell a certain article, this law makes it illegal to ship it in from another State. Is that clear?

Mr. COX. I did not catch the gentleman's statement.

Mr. PARKER of New York. If it is illegal to sell any particular article or any bond in the gentleman's State—

Mr. COX. The sale of which is claimed to be legal because of its interstate character?

Mr. PARKER of New York. No; because your State makes it illegal by your own law.

Mr. COX. Here is the position I take—

Mr. PARKER of New York. Let me answer the gentleman's question first. If the laws of your State make it illegal—

Mr. COX. That is, have outlawed traffic in a certain article—

Mr. PARKER of New York. All right, then, it is illegal to ship it in interstate commerce into your State under this bill.

Mr. COX. That is correct, sir, but could not Congress do that same thing as applied to all the States without involving the question of encroachment upon the sovereign rights of States—

Mr. PARKER of New York. I do not think they have.

Mr. COX. By simply making a declaration to the effect that any article in commerce entering any State, traffic in which is prohibited by that State, loses its interstate character?

Mr. PARKER of New York. I will say to the gentleman that it was the intention of the committee to do exactly what the gentleman is advocating, as I understand it.

To get back to the liability of directors, if you should follow out the policy of making the directors civilly liable—I would make them criminally liable for any misstatements if they were made intentionally, but that is a different proposition—when you make a man liable for a misstatement when he has employed the very best accountants he can get, the very best engineers he can get, the very best appraisers he can get, and then he sits in his office with the board of directors and they go over these figures and use the utmost diligence in setting forth what is correct, I believe they should have the opportunity to go before the Commission and prove that they did not know and therefore should not be held. The burden of proof under this bill is not on the buyer; the burden of proof is on the director, and he must go before the Commission and prove that he did not make a false statement knowingly.

Mr. STUDLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER of New York. Certainly.

Mr. STUDLEY. Does this bill reach the dealer in securities as well as the directors?

Mr. PARKER of New York. Yes; just the same.

Mr. STUDLEY. And the brokerage and bond houses that sell the securities?

Mr. PARKER of New York. Yes; just the same.

There was some discussion about stocks that are already listed. If the theory of the gentleman from Missouri and the gentleman from Illinois were carried out and the stocks that are now listed on the market were required to be registered, you would close every market for months at least, or until they could get the registration papers ready; and allow me to say that in the New York Stock Exchange, the Curb Exchange, and I presume in the Chicago Exchange, they require more data to be filed with them before a stock is registered than we require under this bill.

Mr. MOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER of New York. Yes.

Mr. MOTT. I am pleased to hear the gentleman state that. Does the gentleman know that the Insull stock and the stock of the Central Public Service Corporation of Illinois, two of the biggest rackets in the country, were listed on the New York and Chicago Stock Exchanges?

Mr. PARKER of New York. That is perfectly true, but you can go right down the list and take any stock that you have in mind, and you will find that taking any railroad stock, for instance, they have gone down, and gone down to practically nothing.

Mr. MOTT. The gentleman knows why they listed that stock on the New York Stock Exchange.

Mr. PARKER of New York. I am not defending the stock exchange or going into that question at all. The gentleman can do that in his own time.

Mr. MOTT. I shall try to.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. PARKER of New York. Yes.

Mr. BRITTEN. I am interested in the statement the gentleman just made. He indicated to his former questioner that the New York Stock Exchange and the Chicago Stock Exchange require greater detail in statements upon the listing of new securities than may be required by this bill.

Mr. PARKER of New York. As great, anyway; yes.

Mr. BRITTEN. How are we going to protect the prospective investors in the future if they have not been protected in the past by the filing of statements of a more detailed character than the ones we are now requiring?

Mr. PARKER of New York. I will answer the gentleman in this way: When they file a misstatement with the New York Stock Exchange or any of the other large exchanges their stock is immediately taken off the board, and it is a greater penalty to the stockholders to have that stock taken off the board than any fine you could possibly put on.

Mr. BRITTEN. If I may ask the gentleman one more question, if that is true—and I am satisfied it is—what protection are we giving to the poor lamb in the street who may buy more stock, when we are not improving existing conditions?

Mr. PARKER of New York. We have gone as far as human ingenuity can go. If you will take the bill and read schedule A and schedule B, if there is anything you can think of that we have not asked them to file, I wish the gentleman would tell me what it is.

They have to file what compensation the company is going to get from the sale, and as the gentleman from Texas says, they have to register and wait 30 days before they sell.

Mr. MERRITT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER of New York. I yield.

Mr. MERRITT. The issuer and the underwriter are absolutely liable?

Mr. PARKER of New York. That is what I said.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER of New York. I yield.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will not the effect of the bill be this because of the deflation in value? Will not the bill have this effect: That the big corporations from now on will issue no more stock, but continue to do business for years with the present stock issue, whereas if the legislation was not in force they might reduce the outstanding stock 3 to 1 or even 10 to 1? This bill prevents that, and I think it is a bad thing.

Mr. PARKER of New York. If they can go on and do business with the present stock issue, I do not think it is a hardship. We are trying to protect the man who buys stock. There have been millions and millions of fraudulent stocks sold in this country in the last 10 years, and that is what we are trying to stop. I do not want to stop the honest man from doing business.

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER of New York. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. HASTINGS. I am much interested in this discussion. I was wondering if the committee had considered having the stock that is now issued and previously issued registered.

Mr. PARKER of New York. Yes; but did not approve.

Mr. HASTINGS. I can see a difficulty with reference to the outstanding issues of stock; there is so much of the stock that in order to protect the public the committee should have taken into consideration the outstanding stock issued before this time.

Mr. PARKER of New York. The gentleman from Oklahoma does not understand the question. That stock is already on the market now; it is being peddled and distributed by individuals who are selling their holdings. That is not covered. If you paid $100 for stock, and it is now down to $10, all right, you get your $10. That is not covered in this bill. You will have to accept your loss.

Mr. MOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER of New York. I yield.

Mr. MOTT. The gentleman is very familiar with the provisions of the bill, and I would like to name three outstanding financial wreckages. One is the Insull Co., the second is the Central Co., and the other is the Foshay Co. How, if this bill had been in force at the time that stock was sold, would it protect the public from the investment?

Mr. PARKER of New York. In this way: They have up to 10 years to go through the registration and certificate, and if the registration certificate were not correct on it you could sue them civilly and criminally.

Mr. MOTT. What good would it do to sue them criminally 7 or 8 years afterward?

Mr. PARKER of New York. There is an old saying that you cannot protect a fool from his folly.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman further yield?

Mr. PARKER of New York. Yes.

Mr. BRITTEN. Is there anything in the bill that would prevent a condition of this kind? A big utility corporation, like the Cities Service Co., a highly regarded company—is there anything in the bill to prevent the company buying up its stock today and foisting it back on the public?

Mr. PARKER of New York. Under this bill it would be absolutely illegal. They could not do it, because they would immediately become dealers. The definition of a dealer governs that, and it covers their own stock. They would be dealing in their own stock.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER of New York. Yes.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. After this bill goes into effect I understand that stocks listed on the stock exchange will have to be registered just the same as other stocks?

Mr. PARKER of New York. Stocks that are listed now?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. That will be listed.

Mr. PARKER of New York. Yes.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Do the securities that are listed on the stock exchanges and which become the subject of open-market operations through those exchanges enjoy exemptions which are not equally applicable to other stock issues?

Mr. PARKER of New York. Not at all.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. So there is nothing here that really places the stock listed on the stock exchanges in a preference class as against other stocks?

Mr. PARKER of New York. Not at all. The only preference they get is the confidence of the people that they are sound, because as a matter of fact more people will look at the stock market than will ever look at the prospectuses that are gotten out by the Federal Trade Commission; they know that if a stock is listed that at least the prospectus has been filed with the Federal Trade Commission.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Section 18 prohibits the sale through the channels of interstate commerce in the States having so-called "blue sky laws", and the language is:

To sell or deliver, directly or indirectly.

To what extent does that section prohibit sending advertising matter, circulars, newspapers, through the mails or by radio, which does not result in a sale or delivery, directly or indirectly, of the securities? In other words, does it prohibit the advertising through the channels of interstate commerce within those States, without first having complied with the securities acts of the various States?

Mr. PARKER of New York. Yes. I am not clear upon that, but my impression is that it does.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. The language is "to sell or to deliver directly or indirectly", and I am wondering if when it does not result in a sale or delivery whether there will be any violation of the act.

Mr. PARKER of New York. There will be no harm done in that case.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER of New York. Yes.

Mr. BRITTEN. What is the penalty for a dealer, a so-called "corporation", dealing in its own stocks?

Mr. PARKER of New York. It is just the same as though they were putting out new stock. To use an illustration, if Cities Service should put up its own stock and advertise it and sell it to the gentleman at 50 under a fraudulent statement, a fraudulent registration, then the gentleman can recover from them in a civil suit.

Mr. BRITTEN. But they would not be registered at all.

Mr. PARKER of New York. They have got to register when they operate as a dealer.

Mr. BRITTEN. Suppose they sell through a dealer?

Mr. PARKER of New York. Then the dealer has to register.

Mr. BRITTEN. He will not register that stock.

Mr. PARKER of New York. He cannot help it, unless it is an isolated transaction.

Mr. BRITTEN. I am talking about stocks now on the board.

Mr. PARKER of New York. He cannot get rid of it, if he is going to sell it to the public, unless he registers it.

Mr. BRITTEN. The gentleman means because it comes from a corporation?

Mr. PARKER of New York. It does not make any difference where it comes from.

Mr. BRITTEN. Evidently I have not made myself clear to the gentleman. I am talking about stocks now outstanding. The corporation buys it in, paying a small amount of money for it.

Mr. PARKER of New York. Yes.

Mr. BRITTEN. It inflates that stock in value as they have done in the past, illegally or otherwise.

Mr. PARKER of New York. Yes.

Mr. BRITTEN. It then has its broker offer that stock for sale.

Mr. PARKER of New York. Yes.

Mr. BRITTEN. Surely that stock is not going to be listed.

Mr. PARKER of New York. That stock would have to be listed. It is practically new stock. The only thing that is exempted would be an isolated transaction. If the gentleman had some stock and sold it through a broker to me, that would not have to be registered. If the gentleman advertised it for sale, it would have to be registered, be it old or new stock.

Mr. BRITTEN. Suppose the corporation, being the owner of the stock, does not advertise it, but merely through ordinary channels turns it over to its broker.

Mr. PARKER of New York. The broker could not sell until he had it registered. He would have to have it registered through the corporation, and be subject to the Federal Trade Commission.

Mr. BRITTEN. That stock will never have been listed, I am sure, even under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. PARKER of New York. I am certain they would not sell it, unless they violate the law.

Mr. REILLY. What becomes of the banker in another State that sells the stock, stock issued under this law, which has the approval of the Federal Trade Commission? Suppose it comes to my State and a local banker sells the stock, and it turns out to be fraudulent. Is he liable under the bill?

Mr. PARKER of New York. No; it would be the original sellers.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER of New York. Yes.

Mr. KELLER. The gentleman was chairman of this same committee for some years.

Mr. PARKER of New York. Yes.

Mr. KELLER. Does the gentleman think this bill will help matters?

Mr. PARKER of New York. I think it will very decidedly.

Mr. KELLER. The gentleman knows of the investigation of the Pujo Committee?

Mr. PARKER of New York. Oh, yes; I was in Congress at that time.

Mr. KELLER. Why was not a bill of this kind written some years ago?

Mr. PARKER of New York. Your powers of prophecy are just as good as mine. I could not tell.

Mr. KELLER. Not to embarrass the gentleman, but what I am trying to ask is, Could this not have been prevented if a proper law had been passed years ago?

Mr. PARKER of New York. It could have been prevented, but still this speculation of the last 4 or 5 years is what brought this to the public attention. As the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN], so well pointed out, corporate interests did not amount to much 20 years ago. They have grown by leaps and bounds until practically everything in this country is run by corporations, and we are all stockholders. There are very few of us who have any property except pieces of paper which represent an interest in a certain corporation.

Mr. KELLER. As a matter of fact, has not every one of the panics in recent years, since the Civil War, been precipitated by a stock crash on the New York Stock Exchange?

Mr. PARKER of New York. Well, to a certain extent, the gentleman is probably correct.

Mr. ADAMS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER of New York. I yield.

Mr. ADAMS. As I understand it, certain information must be given to the commission prior to the registration?

Mr. PARKER of New York. Yes.

Mr. ADAMS. Does this bill, in the gentleman's opinion, make adequate provision for the availability of that information to the public?

Mr. PARKER of New York. Why, it is a public record.

Mr. ADAMS. I am asking for information.

Mr. PARKER of New York. Yes; it is a public record; and after the application, if you are going to form a corporation and you file your prospectus, answer all these questions, and I am going to underwrite or handle it for you, I cannot sell it for 30 days after you have filed your prospectus, so that everybody will have a chance at least to be put on notice as to what is behind that stock.

Mr. ADAMS. In other words, there are no rules and regulations by which the public may be prevented from getting the information?

Mr. PARKER of New York. Not at all.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. PARKER of New York. Yes; I yield.

Mr. BRITTEN. The hearings before the gentleman's committee bear out my contention quite conclusively.

Mr. PARKER of New York. I think the gentleman has the Senate hearings.

Mr. BRITTEN. Well, they were just handed me.

Mr. PARKER of New York. That is the Senate hearing.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Huston Thompson says this:

As I said before, my interpretation is that any security that has been put on the market and is being sold is exempt.

Exempt from this act. I was talking about securities that are on the market and are being resold. They will never be listed, and this same inflation, this same method of extraction from the public, will occur again unless by some means that stock can be listed.

Mr. PARKER of New York. It is specifically stated in this bill that if a company buys and trades in its own stock, advertises and puts it back on the market, it must be registered.

Mr. BRITTEN. On a reissue?

Mr. PARKER of New York. Yes; and on an old issue, too. The minute they become dealers, dealing in their own stock, they must register the stock.

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER of New York. I yield.

Mr. McFADDEN. That does not prevent the organization of pools entirely outside the company from accumulating that stock and reselling it?

Mr. PARKER of New York. It absolutely does, because they are dealers under the definition of "dealers", if the gentleman will read that definition.

Mr. McFADDEN. I am referring to stock that is not under this rule and is not a new issue, but is an established issue, like United States Steel or General Electric.

Mr. PARKER of New York. Yes.

Mr. McFADDEN. Pools can be organized and accumulate that stock when it is low and then unload it on the public when it is high. Does the gentleman mean to tell me they must register that stock?

Mr. PARKER of New York. If they are dealers, they certainly must. If they advertise through interstate commerce, they certainly must register that stock.

Mr. McFADDEN. Suppose there is a confidential pool that is buying just through three or four brokers and accumulating it; does the gentleman mean to say that those brokers must register that stock with this board?

Mr. PARKER of New York. I think a confidential pool would come under the heading of fraud, because they must register it, and if they do not register it, it would be pure and simple fraud.

Mr. KELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER of New York. I yield.

Mr. KELLER. What does this do with regard to holding companies?

Mr. PARKER of New York. Oh, this has nothing to do with that.

Mr. KELLER. They are going to do just as they please?

Mr. PARKER of New York. Oh, there is a bill regarding holding companies to be considered next week. We had an investigation that lasted over 2 years on holding companies.

Mr. KELLER. Thank you.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PARKER] has again expired.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BULWINKLE].

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Chairman—

We advocate protection of the investing public by requiring to be filed with the Government and carried in advertisements of all offerings of foreign and domestic stocks and bonds true information as to bonuses, commissions, principal invested, and interests of the sellers.

These are the words of a plank in the Democratic national platform of 1932.

In compliance with that platform pledge, the President of the United States on March 29, 1933, in a message transmitted to the first session of the Seventy-third Congress, among other things said:

Of course, the Federal Government cannot and should not take any action which might be construed as approving or guaranteeing that newly issued securities are sound in the sense that their value will be maintained or that the properties which they represent will earn profit.

There is, however, an obligation upon us to insist that every issue of new securities to be sold in interstate commerce shall be accompanied by full publicity and information, and that no essentially important element attending the issue shall be concealed from the buying public.

This proposal adds to the ancient rule of caveat emptor, the further doctrine "let the seller also beware." It puts the burden of telling the whole truth on the seller. It should give impetus to honest dealing in securities and thereby bring back public confidence.

The purpose of the legislation I suggest is to protect the public with the least possible interference to honest business.

The necessity for this declaration in the party platform and the necessity of the message of the President of the United States arose from the fact that for the past 10 years the United States has been flooded with not only worthless stock but fraudulent stock as well. The amount in value that the people of the United States paid for these securities is purely a conjecture, but it is safe to say that it runs well into the billions.

Many of these securities that were worthless were in a sense handled by American dealers, who made vast profits upon the same, and the American public who bought them have held the bag ever since. Every Member here present is familiar with the testimony of the various investment bankers before the Senate committee, and nearly everyone has read those lurid advertisements issued by American concerns advising the American public to purchase these securities.

During the past 10 years, therefore, the American dealers, the American underwriters, the American investment bankers, and the officers of American corporations in many instances were responsible for the sale of these worthless and fraudulent securities. But they alone were not to blame. The administration aided in no small degree the sale to the American public of these securities.

The necessity for this legislation is apparent to all, and the objective to be sought by the legislation is the publicity of all necessary and material facts connected with the sale of securities in interstate commerce. In other words, the title of the bill is—

To provide full and fair disclosure of the character of securities sold in interstate and foreign commerce and through the mails, and to prevent frauds in the sale thereof, and for other purposes.

The committee, after extended hearings, referred the matter to a subcommittee, consisting of the chairman and four other members of the committee, who diligently and carefully, with the assistance of the capable legislative drafting service, brought before the full committee the bill now under consideration, H.R. 5480.

The necessity for legislation of this character having been admitted by practically all, including many of the investment houses and dealers in securities in the United States, and the objective being, as I have stated before, to give full publicity to the sale of all securities in interstate commerce, the question will then be asked, "How do you propose to attain this objective?" And it is not amiss for me, in the brief time that I have at my disposal, to state how the end will be accomplished under the bill if it is enacted into law.

Every issuer, every dealer, every underwriter, who would sell securities in interstate commerce, either by newspaper advertisement or by radio or any means of transportation or communication, must obtain a registration statement from the Federal Trade Commission. This statement must show all the information required in schedule A or schedule B, under such rules and regulations as the Federal Trade Commission should hereafter prescribe. And the careful study by you of schedule A and schedule B will show the extent of the information which will be required by every issuer, dealer, or underwriter who attempts the sale of securities in interstate commerce. The registration statement should be—

Signed by the issuer or issuers, its principal executive officers, its principal financial officers, its comptroller or principal accounting officers, and the majority of its board of directors or persons performing similar functions (or, if there is no board of directors or persons performing similar functions, by the majority of the persons or board having the power of management of the issuer), and, in the event that the issuer is a foreign or Territorial person, by its duly authorized representative in the United States—

And so forth.

The requirements here are that the board of directors of a corporation and its managing officers must know what they are signing. They are not only liable civilly for an untrue statement of a material fact and for the omission to state a material fact, but they are also criminally liable when they fail to do that which was required of them and which was done with the purpose to defraud the purchaser of the security.

There are many classes of exempted securities from the provisions of this bill, as well as exempted transactions. Any security issued prior to within 60 days after the passage of this act is exempt, and also any security issued by the United States or any Territory, or by the District of Columbia, or by any State of the United States, or any political subdivision thereof, or by any corporation created and controlled or supervised by and acting as an instrumentality of the United States, Federal bank, State bank, notes, drafts, bills of exchange, or bankers' acceptance; securities issued by religious, educational, benevolent, fraternal, and charitable bodies for reformatory purposes and not for pecuniary profits; securities issued by building and loan associations, savings and loan associations; securities issued by a common carrier; certificates issued by a receiver or by trustee in bankruptcy; any insurance policy issued by a corporation subject to the supervision of the insurance commissioner; and also the Commission may from time to time, by its rules and regulations, add any class to these exempted securities if it is found by the Commission that the enforcement of the act is not necessary for the public interests.

And then we have the exempted transactions, transactions by an issuer and by a broker, and the distribution by a corporation of its stock dividends, and so forth. Subscribers of shares of the organization of the corporation are under certain restrictions. So you can find that with the exempted transactions and the exempted securities under the act and under the rules and regulations of the Commission, that the public and business will in no wise be affected.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BULWINKLE. I shall be pleased to.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Directing the gentleman's attention to page 9 of the bill, line 5, can he tell us if open market transactions on the stock exchange are exempted; are they permitted?

Mr. BULWINKLE. Yes.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. This portion of the bill does not refer to transactions in securities that are registered, or, to ask the question in another way, need the securities be registered in order to be exempt under this provision?

Mr. BULWINKLE. No.

Mr. ARENS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BULWINKLE. Certainly.

Mr. ARENS. Was it the intention of the committee to exclude from the exemptions enumerated on page 7, lines 4 and 5, cooperative organizations? Was it the intention of the committee that the provisions of this act should apply also to farm cooperative organizations?

Mr. BULWINKLE. May I ask the gentleman if the cooperatives he has in mind lends money except for the business of the members of the organization?

Mr. ARENS. I do not know of any that do, but they do sell stocks and securities.

Mr. BULWINKLE. If they sell stocks as an issuer or a dealer or underwriter, then of course they will come under the provisions of this act.

Mr. ARENS. Cooperatives should be exempted from the operation of this act, for they are not organized for profit.

Mr. BULWINKLE. That is correct.

Mr. ARENS. Was it the intention of the committee to include cooperatives that are not organized for profit?

Mr. BULWINKLE. To be frank about it, the consideration of cooperatives did not come up before the committee, but I do not see how the ordinary stock of the cooperatives will come under the provisions of this act.

Mr. ARENS. Would the committee accept an amendment specifically naming them in the exemptions?

Mr. BULWINKLE. I would suggest that the gentleman take it up with the chairman of the committee. Personally, I would have no objection to it at all.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BULWINKLE. I yield.

Mr. BRITTEN. Of course, if the stock of the cooperative enters into interstate commerce and is sold, and it is a new issue, that stock will have to be listed under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Certainly; but I understood that the gentleman from Minnesota wanted to exempt the original issue, although I think it is covered under the exemptions. It may not be. So far as I am concerned personally I will be perfectly willing that they be included.

Mr. ARENS. I think the intent of the bill is to exempt cooperatives, but the language is not plain. Several of the cooperatives have asked me to offer an amendment of the nature I have indicated.

Mr. RAYBURN. I may say to the gentleman that no such provision was ever suggested either to the full committee or to the subcommittee. As far as I am concerned individually, if an amendment of the nature indicated by the gentleman is adopted in the Senate, speaking for myself alone, as a conferee I would certainly agree to it.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. BULWINKLE. I yield.

Mr. BRITTEN. The gentleman from Texas will agree to such an amendment, provided it is not organized for profit; but the gentleman did not say he would agree to an amendment that would authorize a cooperative to exchange in interstate business new securities it may be selling.

Mr. RAYBURN. I would agree to certain types of cooperatives being included in the exemption.

Mr. DOBBINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BULWINKLE. I yield.

Mr. DOBBINS. As I understand the bill, it does not exempt the securities of public-utilities companies?

Mr. BULWINKLE. No.

Mr. DOBBINS. The only public-utilities securities which are excepted are common carriers.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Common carriers come under the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. DOBBINS. Was any consideration given in the committee to exempting them since they have already been passed upon by existing commissions?

Mr. BULWINKLE. They are not exempted.

Mr. DOBBINS. I am glad they are not, but some State laws do exempt them.

Mr. STUDLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BULWINKLE. I yield.

Mr. STUDLEY. Is this bill intended to reach municipal bonds?

Mr. BULWINKLE. No; they are exempt.

Mr. STUDLEY. Is the bill intended to reach bonds of irrigation districts or levee-improvement districts?

Mr. BULWINKLE. Those are all exempted.

Mr. STUDLEY. There is nothing in the bill which could prevent the issuance of these bonds and their sale in interstate commerce?

Mr. BULWINKLE. The act does not apply to any subdivision of a State government or any instrumentality of any State government.

Furthermore, under the provisions of the act, an applicant shall have 30 days after the filing with the Commission, except as otherwise provided, and if the Commission should find that the statement is incomplete in any material respect, the Commission may cause amendments thereto to be filed. And, also, if it appears to the Commission, if the registration statement contains any untrue statement of facts or omits to state any true condition of facts, a hearing can be had, and the Commission can issue a stop order.

The power is given to the Commission not to guarantee the securities to the purchasers thereof but merely to require that there be filed with the Commission a true and accurate statement of all material facts, which the purchaser of a security should have knowledge of.

Then, the advertisement, which covers all notices, circulars, communications by radio, and so forth, must contain certain facts which the investing public have a right to know before purchasing the securities. Then, in addition to that, the registration statement is a public record, which under the proper rules and regulations, any person can examine, or cause to be examined, before purchasing the securities. Under the provisions, then, of this act there can be no more "old counselors", who, by means of radio, cause the widows and others to invest in securities which are worthless. For the information of the new counselors it will be so that any person of ordinary intelligence, by due care and due diligence, can protect himself against purchasing securities which are either fraudulent or worthless.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BULWINKLE. I yield.

Mr. BRITTEN. Is there anything in this bill which will preclude an issuing house from carrying in its advertisements the fact that an issue has been listed with the Federal Trade Commission, or approved by the United States Government, and by so doing convey a false representation of its character?

Mr. BULWINKLE. Yes. Under the original bill which was introduced an express provision was put in the bill that they could not advertise that they had listed. In my opinion, and I think I am correct, under this bill that subject is covered.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. If the gentleman will permit, that subject is covered by section 22 of the bill and is fully covered to the satisfaction of everyone.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Yes; it is fully covered.

The machinery of the bill is not complicated or it is not hard to understand. It will not prove unjust to any issuer of securities, dealer, or underwriter, but it will prove an aid to every purchaser of securities. It fully complies with the Democratic platform. It fully complies with the message of the President of the United States, and it should be enacted into law for the benefit of the public as well as the benefit of all legitimate sellers of securities. [Applause.]

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY].

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I am for this securities bill for two reasons. First, it will provide a measure of protection for the investing public. Second, it will give protection to honest and legitimate industry which has been, in many instances, made the victim of greedy and ruthless investment bankers.

The report of the committee on this measure states that during the past 10 years some fifty billions of securities were floated in the United States, and that fully half, or twenty-five billions, have proved to be worthless.

Involved in that statement are countless tragedies for individuals who lost all their possessions because of misplaced trust in supposedly reliable institutions.

Just as important is the tragic effect upon industrial enterprises and the workers who have invested their lives and their labor in them. The committee report contains this statement:

Because of the deliberate overstimulation of the appetites of security buyers, underwriters had to manufacture securities to meet the demand that they themselves had created. The result has been that investment bankers, with no regard for the efficient functioning of industry, forced corporations to accept new capital for expansion purposes in order that new securities might be issued for public consumption. Such conduct has resulted both in the imposition of unnecessary fixed charges upon industry and in the creation of false and unbalanced values for properties whose earnings cannot conceivably support them. Whatever may be the full catalog of the forces that brought to pass the present depression, not least among these has been this wanton misdirection of the capital resources of the Nation.

Mr. Chairman, this excess capitalization took great sums which should have gone into American purchasing power through increased wages and shorter hours. This money expanded productive capacity at the expense of buying power and had a part in creating the lack of balance which is mainly responsible for our deplorable situation. If we can take the destructive hand of the investment banker off industry, a long forward step will be taken out of the present jungle.

BREAKDOWN OF INDUSTRIAL MACHINE

There is no use evading the main problem. Our economic order has broken down. Everyone admits it, even the captains of industry who have been parading past the House Labor Committee on the 30-hour week bill.

We will not remedy conditions until we deal with the disease, not symptoms. The false dawn which has been seen at times during the past 4 years has given way each time to greater darkness.

I hold in my hand a circular sent out last June by a large investment firm. It was issued at a time when a rise in prices had brought hope to many persons.

The circular contains a chart showing the booms and the depressions since 1860. Strangely enough, this chart does not show a single year where business followed the line marked "Normal." Every year was abnormally high or abnormally low. The depressions gave way to boom periods and they in turn went down into the gulfs of panic.

This investment broker says:

You will see that during certain periods of America's economic progress there were certain definite areas of profit. This was just at the bottom of depressions and profits made by wise investors were then "panic profits", because they were made by investors who took advantage of panics and depressed conditions and bought sound securities at the lowest prices and sold them when prices were high, the proper time to sell always.

This investment concern staked its reputation on the statement that 1932 would be the year of profits. Those who followed their advice would reap tremendous gains immediately.

We know that after the temporary upturn, prices of stocks and commodities went to the lowest point in history. It was certain to be so, since there was no solid foundation for our industrial structure. It was built on quicksands.

Cutthroat competition in production and prices and lack of purchasing power through unemployment and part-time wages made impossible the fulfillment of the rosy promise of 1932 as the profit year.

CONTROL OF PRODUCTION

Mr. Chairman, we will be compelled to control the actual products as well as the pieces of paper called securities. This bill deals with symbols. Far more important is control over the realities, the goods back of the symbols.

Last night, before the United States Chamber of Commerce, the President of the United States made an eloquent plea for far-seeing industrial leadership. Here is what he said:

I call your attention to what must be clear to all of us, that each and all of you in your own units and your own industries are but an integral part of a great whole, and that our national economy must be expressed in terms of the whole rather than in terms of the unit.

It is ultimately of little avail to any of you to be temporarily prosperous while others are permanently depressed. I ask that you translate your welfare into the welfare of the whole, that you view recovery in terms of the Nation rather than in terms of a particular industry; that you have the vision to lay aside special and selfish interests, to think of and act for a well-rounded national recovery.

PRIVATE INDUSTRY CANNOT ACT

The President correctly expressed the need. But I submit that under present conditions it is impossible for industrial leaders to carry out any program based on unified action and regard for industry as a whole.

Few of them can look beyond the interests of their own companies. They know that wage reductions mean lower purchasing power and thus prevent recovery. That fact does not help them meet the pay roll on Saturday.

Then those who see their own industry as a whole cannot agree with other members of the industry on the all-important matters of prices and production. Any effective agreement is in violation of the antitrust laws.

The attempts at cooperation which are permissible have uniformly proved futile on account of a "racketeer" minority which seeks to profit by breaking any agreement made.

No, Mr. Chairman; we must get it into our heads that new economic conditions have made a new order of things imperative. We must amend our minds as well as amend the laws.

We face the situation described in the problem given Washington high-school students recently.

Through a mistake in orders, two freight trains, each a thousand feet long, faced each other on a single track. A spur 500 feet long runs from the track to a dead end. How are the trains to pass each other?

Now, Mr. Chairman, they might work on improving the roadbed until doomsday, but that would not serve. No matter how much the efficiency of the engines was bettered, it would not help the trains to pass.

One thing only was needed. That was clear thinking to evolve the required plan. With that clear thinking the problem was easily solved, and the trains proceeded on their way.

We are in a deadlock today. In October 1931 Justice Brandeis, from the United States Supreme Court bench, pointed out that "unprecedented unemployment, a catastrophic fall in commodity prices, and economic losses" had brought an emergency greater than war.

During the year and a half since that time the tragic process has continued, and every effort made has failed to bring industrial recovery. We are swamped in a man-made depression. The depths we have reached make further inaction the most radical proposal possible.

FEDERAL ACTION NECESSARY

There must be immediate action to establish effective control of our vast industrial machine. Private industry is helpless alone. The Government of the United States must lay out the program for industrial recovery and secure the cooperation of every industry and every group in this time of emergency.

We must honestly recognize that unbridled competition has failed as a working principle in our modern industrial age. It must be curbed and controlled for the protection of the public. It is this cutthroat competition which has driven prices of most commodities below production cost.

It is this unrestrained competition which has resulted in millions of men being deprived of their jobs, with wages for those still employed brought to a mere subsistence level.

Only through partnership control by industry and government such as I suggest can the evils of child-labor and sweatshop practices be eliminated. These evils are growing in industrial States and will continue as production rises. They form a vicious method of unfair competition which results in cutthroat prices and destruction for humane and right-thinking employers. Only through such control will we be able to deal with these vicious industrial methods indulged in by a minority in every industry.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] has just referred to the wealth of the United States in 1928 as the gigantic sum of 360 billions of dollars.

With poverty all around us in 1933 we forget that there is more real wealth today than in 1928. We have 20 million more acres under cultivation. We have 150,000 more miles of improved roads. We have more buildings, more machines, more airways, more waterways, more gold, and more currency. We have 5,000,000 more people than in 1928, with their wants and needs.

No one denies our ability to produce not only roofs, rations, and raiment for every American but also comforts and luxuries for all.

All that is necessary is for industry and government to meet their tasks in a spirit of teamwork. The real job of industry is to provide food, clothing, and housing, and other goods for Americans. The real job of government is to organize the economic life of the Nation so that every citizen shall have a fair chance to earn a decent living for himself and his family.

Today both industry and government stand convicted of failure. Success can only come through cooperation in putting 13,000,000 unemployed men back to work making the goods so badly needed.

FEWER WORKERS, GREATER PRODUCTION

Mr. Chairman, the outstanding fact in our industrial system is that machine development has progressed until production can be increased without any increase in the number of workers.

The year 1919 marks that turning point. While in the 20 years before that year the production per worker remained about the same, in the next 10 years it increased about 50 percent. By 1929 production had greatly increased but 3,000,000 workers were out of work because machines had taken their places.

The following table gives a comparison between 1923 and 1927.

Industry	Change in output	Change in employment
Oil: Petroleum refining.....	84 percent more.....	5 percent less.
Tobacco.....	53 percent more.....	13 percent less.
Meat: Slaughtering, packing.....	20 percent more.....	19 percent less.
Railroads, 1922-26.....	30 percent more.....	1 percent less.
Construction, Ohio only.....	11 percent more.....	15 percent less.
Automobiles, 1922-26.....	69 percent more.....	48 percent more.
Rubber tires.....	28 percent more.....	7 percent more.
Bituminous coal.....	4 percent more.....	15 percent less.
Electricity, 1922-27.....	70 percent more.....	52 percent more.
Steel.....	8 percent more.....	9 percent less.
Cotton mills.....	3 percent more.....	13 percent less.
Electrical equipment.....	10 percent more.....	6 percent less.
Agriculture, 1920-25.....	do.....	5 percent less.
Lumber.....	6 percent less.....	21 percent less.
Men's clothing.....	1 percent more.....	7 percent less.
Paper.....	do.....	do.
Shoes.....	7 percent less.....	12 percent less.

The unemployment which began in 1928 has been increased continually as purchasing power declined.

The following table compares 1929 with 1932, not only as to wages but other elements of purchasing power:

[All figures are in millions of dollars]

	Wages	Dividends	Interest	Rent	Other	Total
Year 1929:
Raw materials.....	$3,537	$492	$327	$1,291	$5,469	$11,116
Manufacturing.....	17,966	2,546	209	182	7,115	28,018
Distribution.....	17,129	625	52	1,780	8,288	27,874
Services.....	14,931	1,776	2,064	2,598	1,218	22,577

Mr. Chairman, unemployment is not due to coincidence or famine or accident or economic law. It is due to uncontrolled human action. We had far better attempt to control that human action in industry now than attempt to control it when chaos has come.

The price of survival is a planned and controlled economy. If it cannot be provided in our democracy, it will be provided under some other form of government. For my part I want to help prove that democracy can preserve itself by assuring jobs and a decent living for all its people.

Mr. Chairman, for 3 years I have pointed out that the unemployment which is the root evil in this depression has been due to the unbridled competition which destroyed all balance between production and consumption.

I introduced in 1931 a measure to meet that condition in the bituminous-coal industry, the sickest of all our industries. It provided for sound cooperative control of production and prices.

Then in the first session of the Seventy-second Congress I introduced a measure for the creation of a national board to cooperate with all industries in coordinating production and prices and restoring employment.

I reintroduced that proposed legislation on the first day of this session. I believe such a plan will meet the need pointed out by the President's Committee on Recent Economic Trends. This body of distinguished Americans boiled down two huge volumes into the single statement that our economic ills are mainly due to the fact that we have not provided social inventions to match our mechanical inventions.

The bill I have introduced establishes a governor for our industrial machine to meet this emergency need. It will prevent destructive processes due to uncontrolled competition.

Under the plan I have proposed we can solve the great triple problem of prices, wages, and hours. It will empower industrial leadership to act for the public good. It will give American workers "sharity" instead of charity. It will give protection against forces which have dragged us at their heels. It will provide a method through which America can use her men, machines, money, and materials for the security and prosperity of the Nation.

In this program of coordinating production and balancing it with purchasing power there are several essential features. There should be a declaration of the existence of a national economic emergency undermining the standards of living of the American people. The declared policy of Congress should be to harness the resources of Government and industry to the task of providing employment and expanding purchasing power.

BOARD FOR INDUSTRIAL RECOVERY

There should be a national board appointed by the President for the coordination of industry. It should be empowered to cooperate in the organization of trade associations within each industry. Its purpose should be to help increase employment, expand purchasing power, and stimulate the recovery of private business.

It should be guide and umpire, acting with the industrial group in the establishment of fair production plans and reasonable prices.

This board should have power to approve agreements made by the trade groups within the industry. When the agreement is shown to be such as will tend to increase employment, the board should have the power to exempt such agreement from the restrictions of the antitrust laws.

The board also should be authorized to call upon the Reconstruction Finance Corporation for the advancement of credit facilities where necessary.

TRADE ASSOCIATIONS

There should be responsible and effective trade associations organized within each industry. Where such organizations now exist they should be utilized. Where they do not exist, they should be organized. In all cases proper rules and regulations must make these associations really representative of the industry, or its subdivisions, with freedom of membership for all in the industry and fair voting representation for each member or unit.

Upon these associations would rest the responsibility for initiating price and production standards and establishing fair trade practices. The national board would have the veto power as to the agreements made.

In order to meet the menace which has destroyed cooperative efforts to better conditions in the past, there must be power to deal with the so-called "racketeers" in industry. They are always present. When 82 percent of the cotton textile manufacturers agreed to the 8-hour day and a prohibition of night labor for women and children, the 18 percent outside destroyed the benefits desired.

The Appalachian Coals Corporation, just given a tentative approval by the Supreme Court, involves the agreement of 73 percent of the operators. The 27 percent outside will inevitably destroy the stabilization which is attempted.

There must be compulsion for the minority of blind and destructive operators in every industry. This can be accomplished by the declaration that violation of an agreement, fairly made and approved, shall be considered unfair competition within the meaning of the Federal Trade Commission Act.

COLLECTIVE BARGAINING

The workers employed in these industries should be guaranteed the right of collective action. The establishments and industries benefited should be required to guarantee to employees the right to organize and bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing. No employee should be required to refrain from joining an organization of his own choosing.

The hours of labor should be agreed upon by representatives of organizations of employers and employees. This method would permit of elasticity, under the express requirement that the hours of labor should progressively absorb unemployment in the industry.

PUBLIC WORK CREATING PROGRAM

As an essential part of the program for industrial recovery there should be an adequate place for public improvements. Funds should be provided for needed projects such as highways and those post-office branches, stations, and garages which now add about $7,000,000 yearly expense for rental charges. There are needed river and harbor improvements, ship-building, and flood-control projects, which would add to the national wealth. Far more important, they would expand purchasing power. The money expended would immediately enter the channels of business and create the demand needed to start the wheels of private industry.

Under the controlled production made possible by the cooperation of Government and industry the balance between production and consumption can be reached and maintained.

Restore American purchasing power. The way to that objective is through wages to workers. That money circulates rapidly from worker to merchant, to manufacturer, and it continues to circulate. Of course, Mr. Chairman, there will be difficulties in substituting a system of regulated cooperation for one of unbridled competition. Difficulties have never yet daunted the American spirit. The builders of this Republic found dangers and difficulties as they conquered the continent, but they went through to Golden Gate.

Price and production control seems a danger to many persons. It does not arouse fear in the breast of the hard-driven business man, who faces ruin because of unrestrained competition. Prosperity and less-than-cost prices cannot live together. What matters the ruinously low prices of today to the millions who cannot buy at any price? What really matters is providing jobs for workers with pay sufficient to purchase goods sold at profitable prices.

There will be cries of paternalism against these suggestions I have made. Well, we have followed stark individualism to almost complete destruction, and a change in course should not horrify anyone. But this is not paternalism. It is self-help, with the Government and industry cooperating in the public interest.

My colleagues, there is no time to lose. We are, indeed, at war and the enemy has captured one fourth of our people. The jobless and their families make up 30,000,000 Americans lost to the Republic in every economic sense.

Not only do they add nothing to the national wealth but they cost billions for just such relief as will keep body and soul together.

Have we not witnessed enough human misery to impress us with the need of united action? Have we not suffered sufficiently to make us realize that all industry today is affected with a public interest? To those who protest against any interference with property rights I answer that there will soon be no property rights if we do not protect human rights. To those who cry "unconstitutional" I answer in the words of Justice Brandeis:

We do not need to amend the Constitution. We only need to amend men's minds.

Two forces oppose the necessary action. Those who desire destruction and overthrow wish us to drift on to ruin. There are also stupidly selfish interests who will permit destruction rather than surrender what they regard as their right to reap profit from the helplessness of others.

Both these enemies can be overcome by enlightened representatives of the great mass of the people, who ask only a square deal and no favors.

Mr. Chairman, after passing this securities bill, let us pass a security bill setting up an agency for the teamwork of industry and government in establishing a fair and stable price level, balanced production, fair wages, and regular employment. [Applause.]

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PETTENGILL].

Mr. PETTENGILL. Mr. Chairman, I wish to confirm everything said by the preceding speaker, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY]. That must be one of the next steps, but this is one of the first steps that must be taken. A burned child fears the fire, and the public has taken such a terrific burning with worthless securities in recent years that I doubt if investment can be tempted back into industry unless the public feels more sure in the future than it has been warranted in feeling in the past, that when they again buy securities they are going to buy not only with open eyes but with honest information, so that they can see what they are buying—that the cards will not be stacked against them. This is a part of the new deal; and if there is any bill in the President's program that fits into the description of a new deal with respect to the shuffling of a pack of cards, it is this particular bill, because the cards have not been shuffled honestly in recent years, as we all know. They have been shuffled very dishonestly—so much so that the testimony before our committee is that the American public has been swindled out of $25,000,000,000 in the last dozen years, almost as much as the World War cost us.

The particulars of the bill have been well covered by previous speakers, and I think I would be trespassing on your time if I were to attempt to again go over the bill itself; but in view of the long years that this bill has been maturing in the minds of liberal and progressive thinkers of America, and as a tribute to a great man in the rich evening of his life, I want to go back just a little in the historic background of the bill. The President in his message urging Congress to enact this legislation said:

What we seek is a return to a clearer understanding of the ancient truth, that those who manage banks, corporations, and other agencies, handling or using other people's money, are trustees acting for others.

In his inaugural address the President said:

There must be a strict supervision of all banking and credits and investments. There must be an end to speculation with other people's money.

These words of the President, "other people's money", were first used to attract the attention of the Nation 20 years ago by a man who for the past 40 years has taken a preeminent part in progressive and liberal thinking, and in behalf of honest relationships between human beings, a man whom I consider of all the men who have participated in public life in the last 40 years, who are still active, as the outstanding one of them all, the economic prophet, and the greatest liberal of our time, Mr. Justice Louis D. Brandeis, now of the United States Supreme Court. If you want to get the background of this bill you should read his book, Other People's Money, published in 1913. In 1913 the American public had just taken another terrible beating by the unscrupulous money changers of the Nation. Another Mellen—spelled M-e-l-l-e-n—had wrecked the New Haven Railroad. Others of his stripe had been bringing great insurance companies of New York almost to their knees, causing the famous Armstrong and Pujo investigations.

Twenty years ago Mr. Justice Brandeis saw the necessity of this very legislation, and I am quoting from his book in which he speaks of the fraudulent practices prevailing then. This bill, this part of the new deal, is a child of the new freedom of the Wilson administration, because I am convinced from my reading of Wilson's speeches that if we had not entered the World War, if the attention of the American people had not been distracted by the World War, as early as 1914, legislation along this line would have been enacted in Wilson's first term. Justice Brandeis says:

We must break the money trust or the money trust will break us.

That has a familiar sound to it, 20 years after the words were written. He goes on:

The Interstate Commerce Commission said in its report on the most disastrous of the recent wrecks, the one of the New Haven Railroad:

"On this directorate were and are men whom the confiding public recognize as magicians in the art of finance and wizards in the construction, operation, and consolidation of great systems of railroads. The public, therefore, rested secure that with the knowledge of the railroad art possessed by such men investments and travel should both be safe. Experience has shown that this reliance of the public was not justified as to either finance or safety."

And now permit me to quote a little further from Justice Brandeis' book. The opening paragraph of that book is a quotation from a speech made by Woodrow Wilson in 1911, when Governor of New Jersey, as follows:

The great monopoly in this country is the money monopoly. So long as that exists our old variety and freedom and individual energy of development are out of the question. A great industrial nation is controlled by its system of credit. Our system of credit is concentrated. The growth of the Nation, therefore, and all our activities are in the hands of a few men, who, even if their actions be honest and intended for the public interest, are necessarily concentrated upon the great undertakings in which their own money is involved and who, necessarily, by every reason of their own limitations, chill and check and destroy genuine economic freedom. This is the greatest question of all; and to this statesmen must address themselves with an earnest determination to serve the long future and the true liberties of men.

"The long future and true liberties of men." Disagree as we may with various acts of Woodrow Wilson, it must be admitted that in this respect he foresaw the future of today with uncanny prophecy. The great monopoly in this country is still the money monopoly, and it is because statesmen have not addressed themselves in recent years to that question that we are in the greatest and cruelest depression of American history. It was the money changers of Wilson's time who fought to the last gasp the weakening of that monopoly through the Federal Reserve System, which was the first great challenge to the money changers of our generation, as President Roosevelt's program is the second challenge.

It is the great tragedy that the administration of the Federal Reserve System has in recent years fallen under the control of those same money changers who have used the system to finance speculation both here and abroad.

Justice Brandeis says further at various points in his book:

But this enlargement of their legitimate field of operations did not satisfy investment bankers. They were not content merely to deal in securities. They desired to manufacture them also. They became promoters or allied themselves with promoters.

The investment banker is naturally on the lookout for good bargains in bonds and stocks. Like other merchants, he wants to buy his merchandise cheap. But when he becomes director of a corporation, he occupies a position which prevents the transaction by which he acquires its corporate securities from being properly called a bargain. Can there be real bargaining where the same man is on both sides of a trade? The investment banker, through his controlling influence on the board of directors, decides that the corporation shall issue and sell the securities, decides the price at which it shall sell them, and decides that it shall sell the securities to himself. The fact that there are other directors besides the banker on the board does not, in practice, prevent this being the result. The banker, who holds the purse strings, becomes usually the dominant spirit.

These banker barons levy, through their excessive exactions, a heavy toll upon the whole community; upon owners of money for leave to invest it; upon railroads, public service, and industrial companies, for leave to use this money of other people; and, through these corporations, upon consumers.

Compel bankers when issuing securities to make public the commissions or profits they are receiving. Let every circular letter, prospectus, or advertisement of a bond or stock show clearly what the banker received for his middleman services, and what the bonds and stocks net the issuing corporation. That is knowledge to which both the existing security holder and the prospective purchaser is fairly entitled. If the bankers' compensation is reasonable, considering the skill and risk involved, there can be no objection to making it known. If it is not reasonable, the investor will "strike", as investors seem to have done recently in England.

Such disclosures of bankers' commissions or profits are demanded also for another reason: It will aid the investor in judging of the safety of the investment. In the marketing of securities there are two classes of risks: One is the risk whether the banker (or the corporation) will find ready purchasers for the bonds or stock at the issue price, the other whether the investor will get a good article. The maker of the security and the banker are interested chiefly in getting it sold at the issue price. The investor is interested chiefly in buying a good article. The small investor relies almost exclusively upon the banker for his knowledge and judgment as to the quality of the security, and it is this which makes his relation to the banker one of confidence. But at present the investment banker occupies a position inconsistent with that relation. The banker's compensation should, of course, vary according to the risk he assumes. Where there is a large risk that the bonds or stock will not be promptly sold at the issue price, the underwriting commission—that is, the insurance premium—should be correspondingly large. But the banker ought not to be paid more for getting investors to assume a larger risk. In practice the banker gets the higher commission for underwriting the weaker security, on the ground that his own risk is greater. And the weaker the security the greater is the banker's incentive to induce his customers to relieve him. Now, the law should not undertake (except incidentally in connection with railroads and public-service corporations) to fix bankers' profits. And it should not seek to prevent investors from making bad bargains. But it is now recognized in the simplest merchandising that there should be full disclosures. The archaic doctrine of caveat emptor is vanishing. The law has begun to require publicity in aid of fair dealing. The Federal pure food law does not guarantee quality or prices, but it helps the buyer to judge of quality by requiring disclosure of ingredients. Among the most important facts to be learned for determining the real value of a security is the amount of water it contains. And any excessive amount paid to the banker for marketing a security is water. Require a full disclosure to the investor of the amount of commissions and profits paid and not only will investors be put on their guard but bankers' compensation will tend to adjust itself automatically to what is fair and reasonable. Excessive commissions—this form of unjustly acquired wealth—will in large part cease.

But the disclosure must be real, and it must be a disclosure to the investor. It will not suffice to require merely the filing of a statement of facts with the commissioner of corporations or with a score of other officials, Federal or State. That would be almost as ineffective as if the pure food law required a manufacturer merely to deposit with the Department a statement of ingredients, instead of requiring the label to tell the story. Nor would the filing of a full statement with the stock exchange, if incorporated, as provided by the Pujo committee bill, be adequate.

To be effective, knowledge of the facts must be actually brought home to the investor, and this can best be done by requiring the facts to be stated in good, large type in every notice, circular, letter, and advertisement inviting the investor to purchase. Compliance with this requirement should also be obligatory and not something which the investor could waive. For the whole public is interested in putting an end to the bankers' exactions. England undertook years ago to protect its investors against the wiles of promoters by requiring a somewhat similar disclosure, but the British act failed in large measure of its purpose partly because under it the statement of facts was filed only with a public official, and partly because the investor could waive the provision. And the British statute has now been changed in the latter respect.

This bill does not directly strike at interlocking directorates, but one of its great benefits should be that it indirectly does so by making the responsibility of corporate directors such that few men can afford to sit on more than one or two corporate boards and thus achieve indirectly one of the great objects that Mr. Brandeis pleaded for a generation ago. By the passage of this bill the day will have gone when directors can limit their function spending a few minutes at a directors' meeting for the purpose of collecting a fee.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PETTENGILL. Yes.

Mr. McFADDEN. The gentleman is referring to this class of fraudulent securities, I presume, with reference to the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad securities at that time?

Mr. PETTENGILL. Yes.

Mr. McFADDEN. If my recollection serves me right, those securities at that time occupied a position in the public mind of the highest class of investment securities.

Mr. PETTENGILL. I think we all will agree to that.

Mr. McFADDEN. They were able to float large quantities of those bonds at 3 or 3½ percent, in the light of the high standing of those securities. The New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad practically went broke through the exploitation of the bankers and the officers of that road.

Mr. PETTENGILL. I agree with every word the gentleman says.

Mr. McFADDEN. Can the gentleman tell us who those bankers were?

Mr. PETTENGILL. I regret to say I do not remember their names. I know that Mr. Morgan, Sr., had a large interest in the New Haven road. I do not know who all of the bankers of Mr. Mellen, president of the New Haven road, were.

Mr. McFADDEN. My recollection is that J. P. Morgan & Co. were the principal bankers.

Mr. PETTENGILL. They were the principal bankers.

Mr. McFADDEN. And they got into serious legal difficulties because of misrepresentation to the public in the sale of those securities.

Mr. PETTENGILL. I believe that is correct.

Mr. McFADDEN. I am wondering whether, under this bill, there are provisions that will secure the innocent investing public from further losses when those securities are dealt out to the public by concerns of the type of J. P. Morgan & Co.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Does the gentleman have any specific question in mind?

Mr. McFADDEN. I have this in mind: That the public is being exploited by banking houses of that reputation, whose very names lend confidence to the public. Their very names lend confidence to the public, when upon minute examination in 1929 and previously, as the gentleman has referred to, those securities are not worth the paper they are written on.

Mr. PETTENGILL. That is correct; yes.

Mr. McFADDEN. That is what I want to deal with, and I want to know whether this bill will cover situations like that.

Mr. PETTENGILL. I can only express my judgment on it. I think this bill does cover the situation.

Mr. MOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PETTENGILL. I yield.

Mr. MOTT. Will the gentleman state how this bill covers that situation—how, if this law had been in effect at the time of the New York, New Haven & Hartford swindle which the gentleman just mentioned, it would have saved any investors in that company?

Mr. PETTENGILL. Well, with respect to railroad securities, they have been previously placed under the control of the Interstate Commerce Commission and therefore do not come under this bill, because their sale is already regulated; but speaking of securities generally, if the gentleman will read the bill carefully and will read the schedules that are attached at the back of the bill and will see the information that must be filed with the Federal Trade Commission showing the amount of commissions that the bankers are receiving from the sale, showing the prior liens of all kinds and their character, showing how much properties actually cost to the exclusion of "water" and "balloon juice", showing the conversion rights of other classes of securities that may be ahead of the one that is to be sold, and a multitude of other particulars, then I think that, with the information which is to be furnished under schedule A to the Federal Trade Commission, all of which becomes a matter of public record, to which any investor may refer, he will have as clear a picture of the value and worth and prospects of that security as it is possible to furnish. I might say as a member of the committee which reported the bill, if the gentleman can suggest any additional safeguards in the way of honest information to the investing public, I personally should be glad to have the gentleman's recommendations.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PETTENGILL] has expired.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Indiana 1 additional minute.

Mr. MOTT. Does the gentleman mean suggestions by others that have been given to the committee or suggestions for amendments that may be made here now?

Mr. PETTENGILL. Well, under the rule the bill is still capable of amendment by agreement on the part of the committee. As I say, I am speaking for myself; but if the gentleman can suggest any way of strengthening this bill, personally I should be glad to receive his suggestions.

Mr. MOTT. I can suggest a half a dozen ways to improve the bill, and all securities commissioners in the United States, who are the only people who have any practical experience in the administration of any securities laws, can do so, too. The State blue sky laws constitute the entire corpus juris of security regulation. I cannot amend that bill in committee. Your committee did not call the governor of any State or any securities commissioner or any authority on the subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has again expired.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 1 minute. I will say the committee did not call anybody. People volunteered, and if we started out to call commissioners of States and governors we would never have gotten through the hearings.

Mr. MOTT. I will state for the information of the chairman of the committee that on the second day on which the committee had this bill under consideration I appeared before the committee for the purpose of offering some suggestions and was advised that the testimony had been closed and that no further testimony would be taken.

Mr. RAYBURN. Of course, if the gentleman did not appear until after the testimony had been closed, that could not be helped; but if the gentleman had come to me and told me he wanted time before the testimony was closed, he certainly would have had it.

Mr. MOTT. Of course, I supposed this bill would receive more than 1 or 2 days' hearings, given by people who are familiar with security regulations.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] has expired.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 1 more minute, and now yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. If the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. MOTT] will be kind enough to read the bill, he will see very clearly that this is not that kind of bill at all.

Mr. MOTT. Not what kind of bill?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. This is not a blue sky bill. The gentleman totally miscomprehends the purpose of the legislation. It is merely to give information to those who want to buy securities. In no sense is it a blue sky bill.

Mr. MOTT. It depends on what the gentleman means by a blue sky bill.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. It is in no sense what the gentleman means by a blue sky bill, as he has indicated by what he has said.

Mr. MOTT. I beg the gentleman's pardon, but it is exactly what the gentleman has in mind.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I am reading the gentleman's thought and not undertaking myself to describe what a blue sky law is.

Mr. MOTT. I might remind the gentleman there are some 45 so-called "blue sky" laws. They are regulatory statutes.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. The gentleman is giving information which others have to an equal degree with himself.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] has again expired.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. WOLVERTON].

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of the bill under consideration is to protect the investing public from fraud in transactions involving the sale of stock, bonds, and other securities.

When it is realized that more than one half of the entire wealth of the United States is represented by securities in one form or another, that corporate securities alone amount to more than $160,000,000,000, and that by conservative estimates at least $1,700,000,000 is lost each year by the purchase of spurious or worthless securities, then the need for effective legislation on the subject can be readily understood.

Legislation seeking to give protection to the purchaser of securities has been enacted in a variety of forms by nearly every State. However, notwithstanding the general existence of statutes to prevent such frauds, the fact, nevertheless, remains that the fabulous amount already mentioned is lost each year by innocent purchasers of securities having little or no value, who have been misled by fraudulent misrepresentations and deception as to the real character and value of such securities.

The failure to prevent such losses is not due to any lack of stringency in the statutes already enacted by the several States, but, in a large measure, because of the inability of State laws to reach interstate transactions in such securities. Fraudulent securities are largely sold and distributed by agencies of communication which extend beyond State lines. The jurisdiction of State regulatory measures is necessarily confined or limited to transactions within the State. The channels of interstate commerce are open and free from such State regulation and control. Thus securities that may be precluded from sale in an intrastate transaction are immune when the transaction extends beyond the boundaries of that particular State.

Because of the ineffectiveness of State statutes to give adequate protection, there is a demand for the Federal Government to enact regulatory legislation to supplement and make more effective the State regulation designed to protect the investing public. This bill now before us for consideration, representing the thought of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, is the answer to such demand.

The theory upon which this bill has been drawn is to give the public complete information as to the security offered for sale, rather than a governmental approval of the security. Until the detailed information required by the act has been filed with the Federal Trade Commission, such security cannot become a subject of interstate and foreign commerce. However, when there has been a compliance with the provisions of the bill, the information so filed is made available to prospective purchasers, and thereupon the duty and responsibility of passing upon the desirability of the security as an investment is placed upon the individual who contemplates purchase thereof and not upon the Government.

To have adopted the alternative theory, to wit, the assumption of a governmental responsibility as to the worthiness of such securities, it would have been necessary to set up a vast and extensive bureau of investigation, charged with the appraisal of property, estimating the probable usefulness of patent rights, or likelihood of productivity of every kind of enterprise. Furthermore, the effort to protect, by the adoption of such a principle, might easily lead to injustices through hampering developments based upon patent or other rights that at the time the security was offered would have little if any other than a problematical or possible future value. A very apt illustration, and one with which I am thoroughly familiar, is the development of the talking machine by the Victor Co., of Camden, N.J., my home city. In the beginning, the recording of the human voice was only an idea in the brain of the originator. Those who were willing to invest their money in order that the idea might be developed had no security that would have gained the approval of any governmental agency charged with a responsibility to pass upon the desirability of such an investment. Yet, in subsequent years, by wise and judicious development, it has brought financial reward in large measure to those early investors. Thus it would seem that a more proper sphere for governmental activity would be for it to require full and complete information to be placed at the disposal of the prospective investor, that he might intelligently decide for himself whether or not the investment is desirable, rather than the Government itself decide the question of what is or is not desirable.

There are other reasons that might be urged if time permitted as further justification of the policy adopted by the committee in this matter. Permit me to point out the care with which provision has been made to preclude any unwarranted use being made of the fact of registration of any security, and to preclude the possibility of any prospective purchaser from being misled thereby into believing that the Government has approved such security as an investment. The bill in section 22 specifically provides that the fact that the registration statement for a security has been filed or is in effect shall not be "held to mean that the Commission has in any way passed upon the merits of or given approval to such security." Furthermore, "it shall be unlawful to make, or cause to be made, to any prospective purchaser any representation contrary to the foregoing provisions."

Thus the theory that underlies this proposed legislation is different in its scope from that which forms the basis of many of the so-called "blue sky" laws enacted by the States. The latter quite frequently embody the thought that there is a duty upon the State in the fulfillment of its obligation to protect its citizens from fraudulent practices, to determine the quality of the security to be offered before granting a permit for the sale thereof. This is well illustrated in the act of one of the States which contains this provision:

If the commissioner of corporations finds that the proposed plan of business of the investment company is unfair, unjust, or inequitable, or that it does not intend to do a fair and honest business, he shall refuse to issue the certificate—

And so forth.

And in another act of the same State it is further provided:

If he (commissioner) finds * * * that the securities that it proposes to issue and the methods to be used by it in issuing or disposing of them are not such as, in his opinion, will work a fraud upon the purchaser thereof, the commissioner shall issue to the applicant a permit authorizing it to issue and dispose of securities, as herein provided, in this State, in such amounts and for such considerations and upon such terms and conditions as the commissioner may in said permit provide. Otherwise he shall deny the application and refuse such permit—

And so forth.

Though there is a wide difference between the principle of merely requiring the filing of full and true information concerning the proposed security as provided for in the bill and the principle of assuming an obligation to pass upon the "honest" intent of the issuer and determine whether it "will work a fraud upon the purchaser" and actually fix the "terms and conditions" including the "amounts" and "considerations", yet it cannot be denied that the information required to be filed by schedules A and B of this bill will give all the information that is necessary for any prudent person to have in passing upon the desirability of the investment security. By requiring the purchaser to be judge of his own investment, based upon facts made available to him, the Government is thereby relieved of a responsibility that some would not be willing to acknowledge as a proper function of government.

Every possible precaution to obtain the full truth has been provided by the terms of the bill. Power is given to the commission to withhold the right to deal in any proposed security until every requirement has been complied with. And, to insure care and remove possibility of untrue or extravagant statements of fact, civil as well as criminal responsibility is fixed upon the issuer, every officer, director, or agent who permits his name to be used in connection therewith.

While it denies to no one the right to offer any security to the public, after the facts required by the statute have been disclosed, yet it attaches personal responsibility respecting the truthfulness of the facts submitted, and provides a right of recovery in money damages for anyone aggrieved by any misstatement of material fact. The bill makes no attempt to change the rule "Let the buyer beware", but extends it to include "Let the seller also beware." The bill denies the seller the immunity so long provided by the duty of the buyer alone to beware, and brings the seller into a position of fixed and determined responsibility as well.

The merit of this bill lies in the fact that it provides a means of protection to the investing public without the Government's assuming the stupendous task of passing upon the value, quality, or desirability of the multitude of various types and kinds of securities that are subjects of interstate and foreign commerce.

The plan or policy of the bill is sound. It will prove highly beneficial to any investor who is intelligent and prudent enough to utilize the information made available by its provisions. [Applause.]

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLVERTON. I yield.

Mr. McFADDEN. Is there not the implied obligation that in order to give out the information which the Government under this bill is going to give out, they have got to analyze these companies to see that the statements are correct? Otherwise the Government possibly will be giving false information.

Mr. WOLVERTON. No. If the gentleman will read section 22 of this bill, he will find that the Government, through the agency of the Federal Trade Commission under this bill, does not in any way whatsoever assume to pass upon the desirability, the value, or the quality of the security offered or the truthfulness of the statements.

Mr. McFADDEN. The point I am making is, if the gentleman will yield, that any information which the Government gives to a prospective investor is going to be considered as absolutely correct and will determine the individual's judgment as to whether he will purchase a particular security.

Mr. WOLVERTON. If the gentleman will read section 22 of the bill, he will find that so far as legislative enactment is concerned it has been made just as plain and definite as words could possibly make it that it is not to be assumed that the Commission, by the acceptance of the information, accepts it as true and accurate, or that it does not contain untrue statements of fact or omit to state a material fact or to be held to mean that the Commission has in any way passed upon the merits or given approval to such security. The bill further provides that it shall be unlawful to make or cause to be made to any prospective purchaser any representation contrary to the foregoing provisions of this section.

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLVERTON. I yield.

Mr. REILLY. Does not the merit of this bill lie in the fact that it will prevent the sending in interstate commerce of securities that should not be so sent? And is it not a fact that the judgment of the ordinary citizen will to a large extent be influenced by the fact that the Government has permitted the security to be sold?

Mr. WOLVERTON. The gentleman may be correct.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. PETTENGILL. Will not the gentleman from Michigan yield the gentleman from New Jersey an additional minute or two, that I may ask him a question?

Mr. MAPES. I yield 5 additional minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. PETTENGILL. I wish to direct the gentleman's attention to 2 or 3 lines from a book written by Mr. Justice Brandeis. I quote from page 103 of his book entitled "Other People's Money and How the Bankers Use It."

And it should not seek to prevent investors from making bad bargains. But it is now recognized in the simplest merchandising that there should be full disclosures. The archaic doctrine of caveat emptor is vanishing. The law has begun to require publicity in aid of fair dealing. The Federal pure food law does not guarantee quality or prices; but it helps the buyer to judge of quality by requiring disclosure of ingredients.

Mr. WOLVERTON. I agree with the statement of Mr. Justice Brandeis. A careful reading of the bill will show that the basic theory on which it has been drawn is in accord with the view expressed by Mr. Justice Brandeis in the quotation which you have just read.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MARLAND].

Mr. MARLAND. Mr. Chairman, I will vote for this bill.

The committee and the subcommittee of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce have labored for weeks in its preparation, and the committee has almost unanimously agreed that its provisions will protect innocent purchasers from the designs of fraudulent stock and bond promoters; that it will, in fact, cause the seller to beware of the penalties for its violation, and relieve the purchaser somewhat of the old rule of caveat emptor, "Let the buyer beware."

I am very sorry that the committee could not see with me the necessity of attempting one step farther in the protection of the purchaser of stocks from one of the greatest evils in our present method of financing and operating corporations.

In my opinion, the greatest of all the evils from which our corporations suffer is that the investment bankers have forced a position for themselves upon the boards of directors of the corporations they finance; bleed them white with commissions for financing and refinancing, and mismanage the corporations they are supposed to direct, because of their conflicting interests and because of their lack of knowledge of the business they are directing.

My chief criticism of this bill is that it should have provided: "That it shall hereafter be unlawful for any person to act as a director of a corporation which is the issuer of securities in interstate and foreign commerce who, at the same time, shall be either a partner of or financially interested in any investment-banking concern buying and selling the securities of such corporation from such corporation for profit."

I speak from experience in this connection. I have had business relationship with many of the investment-banking houses in the United States, including the banking house of J. P. Morgan & Co., which latter experience lasted over a period of 6 years.

Mr. BACON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARLAND. I will.

Mr. BACON. I am inclined to agree thoroughly with what the gentleman has said, but does he not think that the provision he suggests properly belongs in a banking bill rather than in the bill that comes from the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee? I believe that such a provision is in the so-called "Glass banking bill", which is being considered in the Senate.

Mr. MARLAND. I am glad the gentleman has made that suggestion. I did not suggest such an amendment, because I was informed it would be out of place.

Mr. Chairman, in justification of my criticism I will quote several eminent authorities, first, a declaration of President Wilson, who said:

The great monopoly in this country is the money monopoly. So long as that exists, our old variety of freedom and individual energy of development are out of the question. A great industrial nation is controlled by its system of credit. Our system of credit is concentrated. The growth of the Nation, therefore, and all our activities are in the hands of a few men, who, even if their actions be honest and intended for the public interest, are necessarily concentrated upon the great undertakings in which their own money is involved and who, necessarily, by every reason of their own limitations, chill and check and destroy genuine economic freedom. This is the greatest question of all; and to this statesmen must address themselves with an earnest determination to serve the long future and the true liberties of men.

In further support of my criticism I will quote from the report of the Pujo Investigating Committee in 1912, which found:

Far more dangerous than all that has happened to us in the past, in the way of elimination of competition and industry, is the control of credit through the domination of these groups (investment bankers) over our banks and industries. * * *

It is impossible that there should be competition, with all the facilities for raising money or selling large issues of bonds in the hands of these few bankers and their partners and allies, who together dominate the financial policies of most of the existing systems. * * * The acts of this inner group, as here described, have nevertheless been more destructive of competition than anything accomplished by the trusts, for they strike at the very vitals of potential competition in every industry that is under their protection, a condition which if permitted to continue will render impossible all attempts to restore normal competitive conditions in the industrial world.

During the hearings held on this bill before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce several witnesses testified, part of whose testimony I will quote:

Mr. George W. Bovenizer, partner in Kuhn, Loeb & Co., of New York City, in answer to a question of mine whether he believed it was entirely proper for an investment banker to serve as a director on the board of a corporation while dealing in the shares that it issued, said:

I think it would be a great deal better if he does not serve. One of the things that have been hurting the quality of investment-banking business has been its occupying that dual position.

And when I asked him if it might not have the effect of leading to the issue of unnecessary securities, he answered:

Yes, sir; there might be a desire to issue securities that the corporation perhaps should not issue.

Mr. Frank M. Gordon, president of the Investment Bankers Association of America, to a similar question from me, answered:

I should say that as a general practice it is not necessary and probably not advisable.

Mr. William H. Breed, counsel for the Investment Bankers Association of New York, New Jersey, and Connecticut, in answer to a question of mine whether an investment banker who buys and sells securities of a corporation should be permitted under the law to serve as a director of that corporation, answered:

Well, if he were not on the board perhaps there would be more competition; there might be better competition, I think.

Further, in support of my criticism and to show that I am not alone in thinking it necessary, I quote from the book written by Justice Louis D. Brandeis, of the Supreme Court of the United States, entitled "Other People's Money and How the Bankers Use It." He says:

The dominant element in our financial oligarchy is the investment banker. * * * The development of our financial oligarchy followed lines with which the history of political despotism has familiarized us.

The original function of the investment banker was that of dealer in bonds, stocks, and notes; buying mainly at wholesale from corporations, municipalities, States, and governments which need money, and selling to those seeking investments. The banker performs, in this respect, the function of a merchant, and the function is a very useful one.

Large business enterprises are conducted generally by corporations. The permanent capital of corporations is represented by stocks and bonds. The bonds and stocks of the more important corporations are owned, in large part, by small investors, who do not participate in the management of the company.

Corporations require the aid of a banker middleman, for they lack generally the reputation and clientele essential to selling their own bonds and stocks direct to the investor.

Investors in corporate securities also require the services of a banker middleman. * * * For a small investor to make an intelligent selection from these many corporate securities—indeed, to pass an intelligent judgment upon a single one—is ordinarily impossible. He lacks the ability, the facilities, the training, and the time essential to a proper investigation. Unless his purchase is to be little better than a gamble, he needs the advice of an expert, who, combining special knowledge with judgment, has the facilities and incentive to make a thorough examination.

This dependence, both of corporations and of investors, upon the banker has grown in recent years, since women and others who do not participate in the management have become the owners of so large a part of the stocks and bonds of our great corporations.

But this enlargement of their legitimate field of operations did not satisfy investment bankers. They were not content merely to deal in securities. They desired to manufacture them also. They became promoters, or allied themselves with promoters. Thus it was that J. P. Morgan & Co. formed the Steel Trust, the Harvester Trust, and the Shipping Trust. * * *

It was in this way that the Morgan associates acquired their holds upon the Southern Railway, the Northern Pacific, the Reading, the Erie, the Pere Marquette, the Chicago & Great Western, the Cincinnati, Hamilton & Dayton. Often they insured the continuance of such control by the device of the voting trust; but even where no voting trust was created a secure hold was acquired upon the reorganization. * * *

But the banker's participation in the management of corporations was not limited to cases of promotion or reorganization. An urgent or extensive need of new money was considered a sufficient reason for the banker's entering a board of directors. Often without even such excuse the investment banker has secured a place upon the board of directors, through his powerful influence or the control of his customers' proxies. Such seems to have been the fatal entrance of Mr. Morgan into the management of the then prosperous New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad in 1892. When once a banker has entered the board, whatever may have been the occasion, his grip proves tenacious and his influence usually supreme, for he controls the supply of new money.

The investment banker is naturally on the lookout for good bargains in bonds and stocks. Like other merchants, he wants to buy his merchandise cheap. But when he becomes director of a corporation he occupies a position which prevents the transactions by which he acquires its corporate securities from being properly called a bargain.

Can there be real bargaining where the same man is on both sides of a trade?

The investment banker, through his controlling influence on the board of directors, decides that the corporation shall issue and sell the securities, decides the price at which it shall sell them, and decides that it shall sell the securities to himself.

The fact that there are other directors besides the banker on the board does not in practice prevent this being the result.

The banker, who holds the purse strings, becomes usually the dominant spirit.

Through voting trusteeships, exclusive financial agencies, membership on executive or finance committees, or by mere directorships, J. P. Morgan & Co., and their associates, held such financial power in at least 32 transportation systems, numerous public-utility corporations, and industrial companies, companies with an aggregate capitalization of $17,273,000,000. Mainly for corporations so controlled, J. P. Morgan & Co. procured the public marketing in 10 years of security issues aggregating $1,950,000,000. This huge sum does not include any issues marketed privately nor any issues however marketed of intrastate corporations.

The goose that lays the golden egg has been considered a most valuable possession. But even more profitable is the privilege of taking the golden eggs laid by somebody else's goose. The investment bankers and their associates now enjoy that privilege. They control the people through the people's own money. * * * The fetters which bind the people are forged with the people's own gold.

All the foregoing was written by Judge Brandeis in 1913. The truth still holds. We need only to multiply the figures to bring it down to date.

These fetters can only be broken by compelling the investment banker to return to his original field of operations; that of a dealer in bonds and stocks and notes, and prohibiting his becoming the maker and issuer of investment securities.

Congress has ample power to impose the prohibitions I suggest upon practically all corporations engaged in interstate commerce in investment securities.

Congress must break the strangle hold which our Money Trust has on the industrial corporations of this country.

This can best be done by making it unlawful for an investment banker to serve on the board of directors of a corporation issuing securities and selling them in interstate commerce.

Justice Brandeis says:

We must break the Money Trust or the Money Trust will break us.

My experience in business proves to me beyond peradventure of a doubt that the failure of many of our great industrial corporations is due to investment-banker management.

This should not be a surprise to anyone.

It would indeed be surprising if banker management could be good for a corporation.

Banker management contravenes the fundamental laws of human limitations.

First. That a man can serve two masters, or two interests, his own and that of the stockholders.

Second. That a man can at the same time do many things well.

Banker management fails partly because private interest destroys soundness of judgment and partly because banker directors living remote from the properties operated have no understanding of the operating problems of the industry they direct.

The banker, with his multiplicity of interests, cannot give the time essential to the proper supervision and to acquiring that knowledge of the facts necessary to direct the operations of any one of the many corporations upon which he serves as a director.

Many of our investment bankers are upon scores of boards of directors of corporations whose securities they have marketed.

It is impossible for them to direct these corporations wisely.

The deplorable situation of many of our great industrial corporations is directly due to their banker management.

In the interest of honesty and fair dealing in the creation of and marketing of securities and in the interest of the corporations themselves Congress must make it unlawful for any person to act as a director of any corporation which is the issuer of securities in interstate and foreign commerce who shall also be a partner or financially interested in any investment-banking concern or other company buying and selling securities of the issuer from the issuer for a commission or for profit. [Applause.]

Mr. PARKER of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MERRITT].

Mr. MERRITT. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the Committee, I need not say that the committee does not believe that this bill or any bill will be a panacea for all the evils in connection with investment by the public. No bill can make everybody honest, virtuous, or wise. That has been proved in connection with the eighteenth amendment. Nor can any bill protect the foolish investor.

I suppose when good times come again, with money plentiful and the people hopeful, it will happen, as it happened before, that a man will ask some friend what he thinks is a good thing to buy and the friend will name a stock, and the man will buy without any more inquiry or information.

I think, therefore, that this legislation is useful, but in rather a limited way. I think also it would have been better—and I tried to influence the committee in that direction, but was unsuccessful—it would have been better if we had confined ourselves to the English system, which requires the filing in the proper office of such a statement as we call for here and then leaves the man to his legal rights and does not provide for the issue of any certificate by the Government, because, as has been said, you can put a clause in the bill that it does not mean a guarantee, but the fact that the Government has inspected this report and approved it sufficiently to issue a certificate will in the minds of many people be construed as a sort of guarantee.

One other thing which I think is most doubtful in the bill is the liability of the directors. Of course, as the chairman has said, a great proportion of the business of the country is done by corporations, and it is important to have high-grade directors.

Now, the bill proposes to hold directors for errors in statements not confined to willful errors, but to errors. Here again I think the English practice is better; namely, they require a statement to be filed, and they require that the figures of the statement shall be approved by a certified accountant. When this is done, except in the case of willful fraud or suppression of facts, no director is liable.

In this bill if there are mistakes the director can be sued. The presumption is against him, and he has to rebut the presumption that he has willfully or carelessly made a mistake. There you reverse the presumption that has been in vogue since the time when memory of man runneth not to the contrary. The presumption of the common law is that a man has acted honestly. This bill reverses the presumption and a director or other responsible party must prove that his statement was made in good faith and that he acted with due care in order to escape liability.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MERRITT. Yes.

Mr. PETTENGILL. The gentleman recognizes that there are many legal situations in which the law reverses the burden of proof when the knowledge is peculiarly within the mind of the person who is charged with that knowledge.

Mr. MERRITT. Yes; but I think this bill accomplishes the same object as the English bill, only in a more complicated manner.

Mr. CANNON of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MERRITT. Yes.

Mr. CANNON of Wisconsin. May I ask one question in reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Indiana? Any procedure that would be taken with respect to false representations with respect to these securities would have to be a criminal proceeding.

Mr. MERRITT. Civil or criminal.

Mr. CANNON of Wisconsin. The thing that the public would be interested in would be the criminal proceeding.

Mr. MERRITT. It would depend upon whether you had bought the stock or had not.

Mr. CANNON of Wisconsin. And the burden of proof in criminal cases in every respect rests upon the State, so the statement of the gentleman from Indiana would not be correct in criminal cases.

Mr. COX. Oh, no. You set up a rule of evidence in this case in which you put the burden on the accused.

Mr. MERRITT. So that it seems to me it would have been wiser if we had followed the English practice. I mention that only to make my own position on the bill clear, not because I think it is sufficient to warrant voting against the bill.

With regard to section 18, on which one of my colleagues and I have signed a minority report, I suppose there is no man here more anxious to maintain State rights than I am; but under the Constitution of the United States, interstate commerce is put under the jurisdiction of the Congress of the United States. We also know that in recent times there has been a great movement in many States by excise laws, and that sort of thing, to keep products of adjoining States from coming over their borders.

I know that is so in my own State and in Massachusetts with reference to the New York City market. The people want to keep a market, and they try, by excise provisions with regard to milk and other products, to rule out the products of other States. One of the great benefits of this Union is that every State has a perfect right to trade freely throughout the United States, if it can do so under the laws of the United States; and I think as this bill relates especially to interstate commerce in securities, section 18 interferes with the constitutional rights which should exist for every American citizen. As I have said, these objections of mine I do not think are of sufficient importance to warrant voting against the bill, but I hope, if the bill goes to conference, that they will be considered. [Applause.]

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CHAPMAN].

Mr. CHAPMAN. Mr. Chairman, this bill, involving many extremely technical legal and constitutional questions, as well as economic problems, has been considered carefully and thoroughly by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, which reported it. We of the committee do not contend that it is perfect, but it does represent the best thought of a number of gentlemen who have devoted their diligent and sincere efforts to its preparation. It is a bill intended for the protection of the American public from the purchase of worthless and fraudulent securities. Under its provisions the issuer, the underwriter, and the technical expert (including the engineer, the lawyer, the appraiser, the accountant, in connection with the issuance of securities) are held responsible for making a full disclosure of every material fact in connection with an issue of corporate securities. They are liable for the purchase price, or for damages not exceeding the purchase price, if they make a false statement, omit a material fact, or fail to exercise due care in discovering the truth or falsity of such statement or omission.

The burden of proof is placed on them to show that after the exercise of the degree of diligence expected of reasonably prudent men they "had reasonable ground to believe and did believe * * * that such statement was true or that there was no such omission." These facts are peculiarly within the knowledge of the corporation, its managers, its underwriters, and its technical advisers. The purchaser cannot be expected to have such intimate knowledge. The seller's legal status is that of a trustee. His obligation is tantamount to that imposed on one who occupies a fiduciary position.

Under the terms of this bill, the corporation itself is held absolutely responsible, but its management, underwriters, and so forth, are held only to the degree of responsibility above set out. To have made them guarantors of such securities, as some urged that they should be, would have worked an intolerable hardship on many honest and responsible business men, deprived commercial enterprises of some of their most-needed talent, and driven many capable and honorable men from the directorates of corporations, to the great detriment of the country. But it is obvious that when one man is a director of 50 or more corporations, as it has been shown in the hearings on this bill that some men are, he cannot possibly give the necessary and proper attention to the duties of his offices and must of necessity neglect his responsibilities. Many men have been careless of the use to which their names have been put.

They have permitted themselves to be elected directors of corporations and have paid scant attention to the business of those corporations. Comparatively few have been as scrupulous as was the noble and peerless Robert E. Lee when he declined the presidency of a corporation at a salary equal to that of the President of the United States, because he knew that the corporation wanted to capitalize his illustrious and stainless name. The average investor has little, if any, technical knowledge concerning the value of securities. He relies largely upon the reputation of the management of the corporation and upon the representations of the issuer, the underwriter, and the technical advisers of the corporation.

The inevitable result is that unscrupulous issuers and underwriters, acting under the protecting wing of interstate commerce, have preyed ruthlessly upon the uninformed and the credulous. They have unloaded worthless and fraudulent securities upon innocent purchasers to their irreparable loss amounting to billions of dollars. Notwithstanding the existence of blue sky laws in nearly every State, the issuers of worthless stocks have avoided their penalties by establishing an office in one State and selling across State lines to people in other States under protection of interstate commerce. For example, although Pennsylvania has a blue-sky law, it has been developed by hearings before the Federal Trade Commission that 90 percent of all security sales in that State are made through the instrumentalities of interstate commerce and the sellers are not subject to the penalties of the State law.

Those engaged in this nefarious practice are able, because of the absence of a Federal statute, such as that which we expect to pass today, to evade punishment by State authorities and to continue with impunity the commission of heinous crimes against the investing public.

It is to protect people from such crooks that this legislation was conceived. It goes even farther than that remedy provided in the civil courts. It provides a criminal liability for the willful misrepresentation or concealment of a material fact. The seller must disclose not only the truth and nothing but the truth but also the whole truth concerning an offer of securities to the public. Not long ago our country was shocked to read that a mother had been sent to jail for selling a pint of beer to obtain the means with which to purchase bread for her starving children. Recently I read of a hungry boy being sentenced to the penitentiary for stealing chickens. The counterfeiter of currency is sentenced to a felon's cell, but the salesman of worthless stocks and bonds in interstate commerce has continued to operate upon an innocent public free of punishment, because no such law as this has been placed upon the Federal statute books.

Many a man in an intemperate moment commits a crime of violence. Many a man in sudden heat and passion snuffs out the life of a fellow being. Frequently there are extenuating circumstances for such offenses. But there are no extenuating circumstances when shrewd and crafty men, skilled in the tricks of a crooked game, sit around a table and deliberately and premeditatedly plan, and ruthlessly execute the plan, by devising cunning schemes and resorting to every conceivable trick of financial legerdemain, to loot an unwary public of millions of dollars earned by the sweat of the brow. Such criminals ought to be held not only to full civil responsibility but also to full criminal responsibility, as provided in this bill. They ought to be driven out of the business world like gangsters and hoodlums in other lines.

This legislation is designed to protect not only the investing public but at the same time to protect honest corporate business. The honest director and underwriter will have no fear of the provisions of this law. One of its purposes is to protect them from the illegitimate competition of financial racketeers. [Applause.]

Under the inspiring leadership of President Franklin D. Roosevelt we have been, and are still, waging relentless warfare upon the practice of hoarding. We believe the enactment of this bill into law will bring money from the hoarders' hiding places. It will be conducive to confidence on the part of investors. It will stimulate industry; it will accelerate the wheels of commerce.

What a blessing such a law as this would have been during the past decade. We believe it would have saved tens of thousands of people from the losses incident to a wild orgy of speculation. Such a remedial measure would have saved $25,000,000,000 to the American people during that period. If it had been upon the statute books, it would have been the salvation of thousands of people who today shudder at the mention of Insull's name and thousands of others who are haunted by the ghost of Kreuger. If there had been such a law, thousands of widows and orphans would not today be saddened and crushed as the result of having invested their money in worthless securities and having had their earnings filched from them by unconscionable promoters.

The enactment of this bill into law will mean the fulfillment of one of the most vital pre-election promises of our great President and will be another forward step in ushering in a brighter and better day for American business and the American public. [Applause.]

MR. PARKER of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BECK].

MR. BECK. Mr. Chairman, that this bill has been drawn with great care and that its aims are very praiseworthy is a matter about which I imagine no Member of this House will disagree. There are features of it, however, that seem to me to justify the careful consideration of the House. My chief concern is that the bill is a perversion of the commerce power to accomplish ends that, if the Constitution any longer means anything, were reserved to the police powers of the States. The act is based, as far as constitutional power is concerned, upon two grounds: One, the power of the United States over post roads, and therefore the mails; and the other, the commerce clause.

The power over the mails is a much broader power than the power over interstate commerce. The United States mails are the instrumentality of the Government, and therefore, while its power with respect to those mails is not absolute or arbitrary, yet it is much broader than that over that indefinable field called "interstate commerce", as to which the citizen has the primary and fundamental right to engage in interstate commerce. This right was not created by the Constitution.

The Constitution was called into existence to insure the freedom of commerce between the States. Before it was adopted every State burdened the free flow of commerce with conflicting and hostile regulations. To emancipate commerce, the power to put it into shackles was taken from the States by the simple grant that Congress should have power to regulate such commerce. It was never intended that Congress should then proceed to put upon commerce the very shackles that it had been created to destroy, and this is shown by the fact that in the first century of our existence under the Constitution Congress never exercised any power to regulate interstate commerce, unless we except the subsidies of land to the transcontinental railroads.

In the absence of any Federal regulation it was held by the Supreme Court that the failure of Congress to exercise its power of regulation was its mandate that commerce should be free, and for 100 years this policy of freedom remained, and, under it, a great continent was conquered, the Atlantic and Pacific linked by steel rails, and the Republic became one of the greatest nations in the world.

Exactly one century after the Constitution was adopted Congress abandoned that policy and began to forge the chains for commerce by bureaucratic regulation. That year it created the Interstate Commerce Commission, and this was followed in 1890 by the Sherman antitrust law, which vainly attempted to limit the inevitable tendency of business to combine into larger units. Ever since, there has been an ever-increasing regulation of American business by Federal bureaus, until today our Government may differ in degree but not in kind from that of Moscow and Berlin in seeking to regulate all forms of industry by an elaborate and oppressive bureaucracy.

In the first century of the Republic it was generally recognized that Federal powers could only be exercised to accomplish Federal purposes, but the destruction of the Constitution began when Congress entered upon the revolutionary policy of utilizing Federal powers to usurp the powers reserved to the States. It was soon seen that if Congress could appropriate moneys for non-Federal purposes without challenge, it could supervise the use of such moneys, and thus usurp fields of power, which were the exclusive province of the States.

About a generation ago it was first asserted that Congress could deny the privilege of engaging in interstate commerce to anyone who did not conform to the views of Congress as to the methods of production. This heresy has now been carried to the extreme of holding that no one can engage in interstate commerce as of right, and that the Government may license or refuse to license a citizen to engage in interstate commerce. Such a right was not created by the Constitution. Indeed, it is one of the natural rights which are included in the solemn guaranty of the right to "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness", but the present theory is that unless the manufacturer conforms to the wishes of the Federal Government in regard to the hours of labor, his maximum output, a minimum-wage law, and other restrictions, he can be proscribed by his own Government and denied the privilege of selling his products in interstate trade.

This is economic slavery. It destroys not merely the rights of the States but the basic freedom of the individual to engage in lawful occupations. It concerns both employer and employee, and, to quote Jefferson's words in his first inaugural, it "takes from the mouth of labor the bread it has earned."

The two basic industries of America are concerned with the production of agricultural products and the manufacture of goods. The Constitution did not attempt to give any power over the production of either class of commodities. If they required regulation, such power belonged to the States, and, as stated, the Federal Government acted upon this theory for more than a century. The Government could tax products and it could regulate their interstate transportation or their exportation to foreign countries. Nothing would have more amazed the generation which created the Constitution than the idea that the Federal Government, which they were creating, could regulate the conditions of the farm or the factory. Notwithstanding this, the Federal Government for many years past has, through its many bureaus and commissions, and notably through its Departments of Agriculture and Labor, attempted to control both the factory and the farm, and if the legislative proposals which are now before Congress, with the powerful imprimatur of the President and the "brain trust", become law, the Government's control will be complete.

However, it is not of that that I wish to speak at any length, because, in the first place, it is almost futile to discuss questions of constitutional power and the exact fields of the Federal and State Governments in Congress, but also because when I last attempted to challenge the attention of the House to the question of its own powers, when we were discussing the embargo resolution, I remember my good friend and valued associate, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McREYNOLDS], made the remark that, as far as the Democratic side of the House was concerned, it had ceased to pay as much respect as it had formerly to any expression of opinion of mine on questions of constitutional law, because, as he said in utmost good humor—and I accepted it as such—my views were more or less influenced by partisan considerations.

I want to say, in the first place, although it has nothing to do with the merits of this bill, that I never made an argument in this House upon a question of constitutional power in which the spirit of partisanship had any influence whatever. On the contrary, when the entire Democratic Membership in a former Congress decided, as it seemed to me it was their duty, to protest that the delegation of the taxing power to the Tariff Commission was a clear violation of the Constitution, I parted company with all my associates on the Republican side of the aisle and supported the Democratic view. I thought it sound then and I think so still. I could instance other cases where my views of constitutional questions have been so clearly free from any element of partisanship that while I know my friend Mr. McREYNOLDS said it in the good-humored exchange of debate, yet I do want my friends on the Democratic side to believe me when I say in all sincerity that while I may be a partisan on questions of legislative policy, yet when it comes to a question of constitutional law, in which I have taken for 50 years a very deep interest, my views, even though they be the views of an old-fashioned constitutionalist, one of a class rapidly passing, are sincere and not influenced by any question of partisan politics. Certainly they will not be so today, for this bill is noncontroversial so far as party politics is concerned.

I was about to say that the power over the mails might have been invoked, I think, to justify this legislation. If the Congress has power to prevent fraudulent matter from being sent through the mails, it has the equal power, by preventive methods, to determine whether a matter is fraudulent that is about to be sent through the mails. Even there, please note the contrast between the solicitude that once prevailed in this Chamber in respect to the rights of the States and the apathetic indifference that now prevails on both sides of the aisle as to whether another reserved right of the States shall be torn from them and vested in an already excessively centralized Government. Ninety-eight years ago in this Chamber, at a time when it was of the utmost importance to the Union that antislavery literature should be excluded from the mails, an attempt was made to pass a law authorizing any postmaster to exclude from the mails any literature of an antislavery character. It passed the Senate. It reached the House. John Quincy Adams then rendered one of his great public services. He was not an abolitionist, because he believed that slavery had been recognized by the Constitution and was as much a part of it as any other guaranty of the Constitution. Nevertheless John Quincy Adams rose in the House of Representatives and protested against any power to use the mails in order to achieve the ulterior purpose of suppressing an agitation that even then was menacing the existence of the Union; and this House, in its very deep solicitude for the rights of the States, and above all, its jealousy of any attempt to pervert Federal power to accomplish ulterior ends, refused to pass the bill.

However, we have long passed that period of extreme solicitude for the rights of the States.

We have now reached possibly the necessary conclusion that a Federal instrumentality, like the United States mails, may not be used in the frustration of Federal authority.

If this act sought as its constitutional basis the power to exclude from the mails even in a preventive or anticipatory way the distribution of securities, it might well be within the powers of Congress.

This bill deals with the issuance of securities and their purchase and sale as though it were interstate commerce. It defines it as interstate commerce. Our Supreme Court from the time of Paul against Virginia, decided 70 years ago, and in a long line of cases have said again and again that choses in action of the same character as a share of capital stock, a bill of exchange, or any similar matter, is not a commodity of commerce, which can be regulated by the Federal Government but is purely intrastate in character. Yet this bill says in effect that if I telegraph to—morrow to New York to buy 500 shares of Pennsylvania that in purchasing this stock on the floor of the New York Stock Exchange I have engaged in interstate commerce. This, to my mind, is a false idea; and if carried to its extreme there is no power of the States that cannot be taken from them by the Federal Government in this highly complicated civilization by simply misusing the commerce powers to achieve that end.

This is a striking vindication of a prophecy I heard uttered 25 years ago at a public dinner of the Pennsylvania Society of New York. The chief speaker was a man whose rank as a lawyer and a statesman is such that no one would question it, Elihu Root. Mr. Root said then, in substance—and his speech attracted adverse comment, especially in the South—that if the States were not wise enough to suppress fraud and bring about good government within their borders, the Federal Government would do for the American people what the States thus neglected. As I said before, this was very widely criticized at the time as an extreme assertion of Hamiltonian federalism.

His prediction has come true to the uttermost letter, for anyone who for 25 years has studied the legislation of Congress and the decisions of the Supreme Court, which slowly and reluctantly yields to one usurpation of Federal power after another, must realize that the commerce power, with its infinite ramifications, has now been used to take from the States reserved police powers given to them by the Constitution. This is strikingly illustrated by proposed legislation about to come before this body, where an attempt will be made to regulate, through the commerce power, the hours of labor in manufactories, and the Labor Department will be given the power to prescribe the maximum of output and minimum wages.

The whole system of our dual government can be torn down, as it has been very largely torn down, if you allow some of these tremendous powers of the Federal Government to be used for purposes, for which they were not given by the Constitution.

In the Trade Mark cases (100 U.S. 96) the Supreme Court held:

When, therefore, Congress undertakes to enact a law which can only be valid as a regulation of commerce it is reasonable to expect to find on the face of the law, or from its essential nature, that it is a regulation of commerce with foreign nations or among the several States or with the Indian tribes. If not so limited, it is in excess of the power of Congress. If its main purpose be to establish a regulation applicable to all trade, to commerce at all points, especially if it be apparent that it is designed to govern the commerce wholly between citizens of the same State, it is obviously the exercise of a power not confided to Congress.

In Paul v. Virginia (8 Wall. 168) the same Court ruled:

Issuing a policy of insurance is not a transaction of commerce. The policies are simple contracts of indemnity against loss by fire entered into between the corporations and the assured for a consideration paid by the latter. These contracts are not articles of commerce in any proper meaning of the word. They are not subjects of trade and barter offered in the market as something having an existence and value independent of the parties to them. They are not commodities to be shipped or forwarded from one State to another and then put up for sale. They are like other personal contracts between parties, which are completed by their signature and the transfer of the consideration. Such contracts are not interstate transactions, though the parties may be domiciled in different States.

I recognize that the term "commerce" not only includes navigation but the transportation, by whatever agencies, of commodities or of passengers, even on foot, or the transmission of ideas, and it is immaterial whether such transportation is connected with a sale. I argued as such in the famous Lottery case (188 U.S.). Included in the term "transportation" are all the services in connection with the receipt and delivery of the property transported. A contract may or may not be a transaction of interstate commerce. If it is in the form of a bill of lading, it is; but if in the form of a bill of exchange, or of a contract to perform labor outside the State, or of a contract for future delivery to be executed in another State, or of the contract of a private banker with his depositors, it is not.

Let us consider this question realistically. A group of business men project a corporate enterprise.

Is that interstate commerce? No.

Their lawyers prepare the papers for a charter and the form of the securities.

Is that interstate commerce? No.

They then list the securities and sell them on the New York Stock Exchange.

Is that interstate commerce? No; even when the buyer, represented by a New York broker, lives in another State.

Securities, negotiable or otherwise, may then be shipped from New York to another State.

Is that interstate commerce? Possibly, but it is a very slender thread to hang Federal supervision of corporate securities upon it. No one has hitherto dreamed that such a construction could be put upon the commerce power until the "brain trust" evolved the idea. A bill of lading is an instrumentality of commerce because it represents the property, but a bill of exchange, which is a matter of banking, is not a part of interstate commerce even when sent from one State to another. There is no limit to the Federal power over all business transactions if the commerce power can be perverted to regulate intrastate business transactions. This is "nullification by indirection", a term I first used about 25 years ago, when I addressed the Rhode Island bar. I then predicted that this pernicious doctrine, by which the reserved rights of the States could be destroyed by the indirect effect of the commerce power, would one day destroy our dual form of government. That prediction is in process of verification, if it be not already verified. I was a Cassandra then, as it is probable that in my present warning I am a Cassandra now.

This bill, on its face, shows that it seeks a power to reach police regulations which the States ought to have passed.

No one need question the abhorrence I have for corporate abuses. I practiced for 17 years in the city of New York and had a good many influential clients. Some of them, I am very glad to say, were honest men.

Mr. PETTENGILL. How many?

Mr. BECK. I would not attempt to take a census, but if Diogenes, with his lamp, in his eternal quest for an honest man, had gone into Wall Street in those days, his search would not have been short or easy. [Laughter.] Let me give you my opinion of one great cause of the financial immorality of some Wall Street adventurers.

Philosophically, it is the device known as the "corporation." The corporation, of all artificial institutions of man, is at once the most beneficent and the most maleficent. It is the most beneficent in combining capital so that large and important undertakings can be carried on, for which the capital even of a Rockefeller might not be adequate. Our stupendous growth as a nation has resulted from the corporate form of transacting business. It is, unfortunately, also infinitely maleficent, because the corporation dissipates moral responsibility. I have seen it, and any practicing lawyer I suppose has seen it, that a man who, in his private life will be scrupulously honest, yet as president of a corporation he will at times do things of an immoral character on the theory that he is only the trustee for the stockholders and is acting in their interests.

The financial irresponsibility that has resulted from the corporation is immeasurable.

This has been greatly increased by the fact, and this is a strange fact—I am dealing with moral psychology now—that of all the peoples of the world the freeman of America is the last to resent being robbed. You let a corporation fail in England, even honestly, and all the stockholders want to know the reason why and ask the managers to give an accounting of their stewardship; but a corporation here can fail to the extent of hundreds of millions of dollars, in which thousands of investors have lost their all, and not a stockholder will ever appear at a meeting, ask a question, or commence a civil suit, or institute a criminal proceeding.

Why, in England they have a minimum of regulations by law of corporations, but they have prosecuting officers who prosecute. When I was in London last year I went into the criminal court to hear the trial of Lord Kylsant. Lord Kylsant was the managing director of the Royal Mail Steam Packet Co. In order to issue bonds or debentures, he had issued a prospectus, or rather it was issued over his name, in which only two things were alleged to be false. One, that he gave the average earnings of the Royal Mail for the last 10 years. He stated them accurately, but he was convicted for not telling the investors that the earlier years of the 10 years were abnormal and made the average of the 10 years misleading; and the second charge for which he was convicted, was that he forgot to say that in the earnings of one year there was a nonrecurring and an extraordinary profit; and Lord Kylsant, one of the greatest peers in England, was convicted, the conviction affirmed, and he went to jail, and it was done very promptly. In England they ask no other remedy and it has proved effectual.

From what I have seen of corporate business in this country, I believe that if we had prosecuting attorneys and judges who would speed the trial of criminal cases, and as a result, if there were more of this class of predatory millionaires in jail and less of them in palatial homes on Fifth Avenue, we would not have any necessity for this legislation. [Applause.]

I mention all this because it is a kind of psychological background to the question. The American will not fight for his rights, I do not know why.

In the second place, the corporate skulduggery of this country has been also due to the greed of States in their mad rush to get a few little fees for chartering corporations, under which they have issued piratical letters of marque and reprisal to prey upon the people of the country.

With this disposition of the States to make corporation laws so simple that a man can put a coin in a slot and draw out a charter and do anything he pleases, and with all the artificial divisions into holding companies and affiliated securities, and God knows what other skulduggery, the corporate life in this country is rotten to the core [applause], and if a pragmatic sanction is necessary for this legislation, it has it in this fact. This may justify the usurpation of power that now seeks to use the commerce power to deal with a situation that is essentially not one of interstate commerce, as the Supreme Court has held, but wholly of the police powers of the States. The losses have been in billions, and it is not unnatural that an outraged citizenry, Constitution or no Constitution, want to enact this legislation—but what are you going to accomplish when you do it?

You have put the power not in the Secretary of Commerce but in the Federal Trade Commission, easily one of the most futile of the bureaucratic agencies in Washington. The Commission will undoubtedly employ more men and subdivide itself into new bureaus and will receive these papers, which nobody will read, and when this is done the high-pressure salesman will go out to the people and tell everybody to whom they want to sell a rotten bond, "Oh, you know this has been supervised by the Federal Trade Commission." The United States Government has given its imprimatur, and the poor woman who has a little money to invest—

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BECK. I yield.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I just want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that there is a section of the bill that puts such a man in jail.

Mr. BECK. Yes; but it is very hard to catch him, may I say to my friend.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Of course, you have to catch a rabbit before you can have hash.

Mr. BECK. I know this is a very carefully drawn bill, and has sought to safeguard against this result; but I know my friend from Alabama will agree with me that in the actual detection of these fugitive and peripatetic salesmen they will have a hard time in ever proving he ever said anything of the kind, but he will have said it nevertheless, and I am inclined to think the bill may thus increase the sale of rotten securities, and not decrease them.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BECK. Yes.

Mr. PETTENGILL. I want to applaud what the gentleman has said about rottenness of corporation regulation, but I would like to get clear in my mind whether the gentleman thinks this is outside of interstate commerce under Paul against Virginia, which was an insurance-policy case.

Mr. BECK. Yes.

Mr. PETTENGILL. And is the gentleman familiar with the Textbook cases, in Two hundred and Seventy-first United States Reports?

Mr. BECK. I argued International Text Book against Pegg in the Supreme Court, and therefore know the decision very well.

Mr. PETTENGILL. The gentleman will remember that in that case the Supreme Court held that insurance policies are not subjects of trade and barter offered in the market as something having an existence and a value independent of the parties to them.

Mr. BECK. I ought to be familiar with that.

Mr. PETTENGILL. And there are very many other Federal cases holding that securities are articles of interstate commerce.

Mr. BECK. But in the case referred to, the subject matter was not securities.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Not in those cases. They were correspondence-school courses.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. PARKER of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. PETTENGILL. And there are many Federal cases holding that stocks and bonds are articles of interstate commerce.

Mr. BECK. Well, I am not so sure that is so, although my friend may be right. There are plenty of decisions, from Paul against Virginia down, which was an insurance-policy case, with respect to where various kinds of choses in action were held not articles of commerce within the meaning of the Constitution. The International Textbook case related to printed, scholastic literature sent as any other book through the mail.

Grant for the purposes of the argument that when I buy a share of stock in New York and the broker ships it to me—provided I do not pick it up in New York—the transmission of the share of stock to Washington is a transaction of commerce. Yet the fact remains that you are using the power to enact essentially police regulations, which for one hundred and forty-odd years have been universally accepted as the province of the States. You cannot have it both ways. Let us see how far this bill may carry us. If this is a Federal function, then many State laws regulating the sale of securities may be illegal as being a burden on interstate commerce, and if, on the contrary, they are within the power of the States how has the Federal Government the right to regulate it?

Mr. PETTENGILL. Does the gentleman believe that the Lottery cases were wrongfully decided by the Supreme Court?

Mr. BECK. I do not. I argued, and successfully, that great case in the Supreme Court.

Mr. COX. If the gentleman will yield, the decision of the Court in the Lottery Case was based upon the theory that the lottery tickets were things of value in that they represented the chance for a very large prize and were therefore the proper subject matter of commerce, whereas, in the bill before the House Congress seeks to bar from commerce a mere prospectus which simply extolls the merit of some article or thing. A prospectus is not a thing of value, it is not even intercourse, and therefore is not commerce, and not subject to the control of Congress.

Mr. BECK. The gentleman has answered it better than I could. But the fact remains that this bill is so broad that any communication with respect to the purchase or issuance of securities is sought to be brought within the commerce power of the country, and that means the preemption of a vast field of power that for 140 years has been exclusively the province of the States respectively.

Mr. COX. And the Federal power never attaches until the article, which is the proper subject matter of commerce, enters commerce, and the Federal power is exhausted when that article finally reaches its destination, and becomes intermingled in the common mass of property.

Mr. BECK. When it merges into the property of the State of destination.

Mr. REILLY. I should like to ask the gentleman if this bill becomes a law, will it be of any assistance to my State or my county?

Mr. BECK. That is a question I shall not pretend to answer. I believe that all this confusion of Federal and State laws is a mistaken policy.

Mr. TERRELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BECK. I yield.

Mr. TERRELL. If the court holds that this provision is legal, then the State law might fail.

Mr. BECK. I have already indicated that possibility.

I am in sympathy with the objectives of this bill, but I cannot reconcile myself to this method of regulation through the commerce power, as I regard it as a clear usurpation of the reserved police powers of the States. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has again expired.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. KOPPLEMANN].

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the Committee, I could add nothing to this discussion. The measure before us will undoubtedly be adopted without a dissenting vote, but it seems to me, in the light of what the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Beck] a moment ago stated, and his recalling the prophecy of Elihu Root 25 years ago, it might be well for me to state to this House that the State of Connecticut, from which I come, attempted on three occasions, through measures introduced by me in the legislature of that State, to adopt some sort of a blue sky law. Each time it failed because of the fact that those who constitute these investment bankers, a certain group of them, engaged able lawyers and lobbyists to defeat the measure. So the State of Connecticut, as many other States undoubtedly, was unable to adopt a measure such as this. It is well that we have a Congress; it is well that we Members of this Congress are in a position to do that which our several States have been unable to accomplish, and so I am happy in the thought and in the knowledge that as a Member of this Congress I shall vote for a measure which means so much to all of the people of this country.

Of course no industry wants to be regulated, of course here and there somebody finds fault with the provisions of this bill. That is to be expected. None of us is so optimistic as to believe or even contend that we have a measure that is 100 percent perfect in all its provisions, but we are happy to know that that for which many of the people of this country have been pleading and demanding and which should have been a part of the laws of this country for a number of years is about to be accomplished.

Mr. CANNON of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. Yes.

Mr. CANNON of Wisconsin. Does the gentleman not think this bill would have been much stronger if bankers had been included?

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. I believe this bill would have been stronger if bankers had been included. I believe if the bill had included issues heretofore made it would be stronger, but as I said a moment ago, none of us is so optimistic as to contend that this measure is 100 percent perfect. It is a very great stride forward, however.

Mr. CANNON of Wisconsin. Why is it when any measure ever comes up before this House or before the Senate, which affects big business and affects bankers, that they always sneak out in some way?

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. Unfortunately that is true, but in this measure they are going to be held to certain accounting.

Mr. CANNON of Wisconsin. What protection has the mass of the investing public in purchasing securities from banking institutions in this country?

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. I am frank to admit that I do not know, and I prefer to yield to a member of the committee to answer that question.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Connecticut has expired.

Mr. PARKER of New York. I yield 1 minute more to the gentleman.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, in view of the question of the gentleman from Wisconsin, it ought to be said that investment bankers and all bankers who deal in the securities of other corporations do come under the provisions of this bill. They will be required to furnish the information which these statements require. They are held to strict accountability for the truth of the statements of all material facts which they make, the same as other people are. The only provision which relates to the exemption of bankers is the one which exempts securities issued by a national bank and in certain cases State banks. The reason for such exemption is that such banks are already under the control of Federal and State authorities, and they are exempt only in the sale of their own securities or stock.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. Mr. Chairman, after 3 years and 7 months the people of this Nation, with the help of Congress, will be offered a measure of protection against unscrupulous securities operators. The consideration of the securities measure in the House today marks a new recognition of responsibility on the part of the Government for the safety of investments made by millions of wage earners and small business men. It is a responsibility that should have been realized long ago. But it is, however, as the saying goes, "better late than never."

Since the crash of 1929 we have witnessed a steady downfall in the general price structure of commodities and securities. As a result of that catastrophe, there has been created a wide-spread doubt and shattered confidence in the business and financial structure of the Nation. This has been a direct result of the unethical practices of promoters and fly-by-night investment propositions.

Today, as a Congress, we are considering a measure designed to correct the ills of the past and to insure investment safety for the future. It is a measure resulting from the insistent demands of the day for the reestablishment of sound business principles and ethical business practices. Confidence in the integrity of business must be restored before we can expect the investing public to support any enterprise and continue faith in those already in existence.

Decrying the experiences of the past and criticizing the actions of those responsible for the almost unbelievable losses sustained is not enough to bring about a correction of the practices. During prosperous days losses of the past are soon forgotten. The time has come when legislative action is needed to prevent a recurrence of the debacle of 3 years and 7 months ago.

A money-seeking people goaded on by the lures of those who appeared successful were only too willing to follow untied leadership. Any business which seemed to make large profits rapidly was one in which all wanted to participate. The man who had that enterprise was forthwith acclaimed a genius and a financial pillar. His words were listened to with awe and were accepted with the highest degree of respect and authoritativeness. To secure a following all that was needed was an appearance of financial success and not proof of actual financial accomplishment. As a result of this attitude on the part of the people, and because of the lack of interstate securities trading regulations, we have such experiences as those resulting from the manipulations of Kreuger, Insull, and others who are less conspicuous. Where in the nineteenth century we relied on the integrity of a family for an honest presentation of the soundness of a particular enterprise, we have to rely today on published reports of our great corporations. These published reports are now the only authoritative information upon which the investors can judge of the success or failure of the companies in which they have invested their money. That the truth should be demanded in these statements is obvious in itself. It is the purpose of this legislation to require that the truth be told and told in such a manner as to be unmistakable.

It is generally recognized that the lack of complete disclosure of the results of business operations was one of the major contributing factors associated with the inflation of security values which preceded the crash of 1929. Had there been a more frank and honest expression of business and investment operations millions would have been saved from the false impression that profit making would be continuous.

The need for Federal regulation of interstate traffic in securities is made striking by the fact that there are 48 States, each of which has different regulations and different penalties for violations of investment and securities laws.

Such differences have permitted practices which have been extremely detrimental to investors. Federal regulations of securities sales interstate will bring about a high degree of order out of existing chaos.

Mr. PARKER of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN].

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, one cannot say very much in 5 minutes on this subject. I am very much in sympathy with the purposes for which this bill is brought before the House. I have been pointing out for some years past the necessity for some kind of regulation of the sale of investment securities to the innocent public. During the past 5 years practically the entire business of the United States has been reorganized and new securities have been issued and sold to the investing public. Because of the fact that the New York Stock Exchange is the center for the distribution of securities in the United States, and the fact that New York City is the financial center of the United States, most of this reorganization and the issuance of these securities has taken place in the city of New York. These large investment houses—some of them independent, but most of them affiliated in some form or another with the large banks, including both Federal Reserve banks and private banks—have been the institutions which have handled this particular business. I recognize the fact that the laws of the State of New York should have protected the investing public against the issuance of inferior securities and the exploitation of the public, and by the public I mean the investors in the 48 States. That has not only applied to the question of the organization and the sale of domestic securities but it has also applied to the issuance and sale of foreign securities in the United States.

I likewise feel that the administrators of the laws of the State of New York, particularly under the Martin Act, have failed to protect the securities that have been emitted by institutions under the control of the laws of the State of New York. I include in that also the operations of the New York Stock Exchange. May I be a little more specific? The New York Stock Exchange officers have gone so far as to go abroad and seek an opportunity to list foreign securities on the New York Stock Exchange. They have succeeded in that, and have permitted trading in securities of foreign issue, and they have regularly dealt in them through the exchange.

The rules and regulations of the New York Stock Exchange, I recognize, during the past 3 years, have been greatly perfected, particularly as regards information pertaining to the securities that are listed. That is a good thing, but it was much like locking the barn door after the horse was stolen. There is not anything that is any better for the investing public to have than full and correct information on securities, but let me point out to you one instance in which I was particularly interested, because in the year 1930 I introduced a resolution in this House to forbid the sale of German commercialized reparation bonds in the United States, which the international financial group was about to offer. I got very little consideration at the hands of the administration here, but we held some hearings in the Committee on Banking and Currency at my instance. The Secretary of State and the Secretary of the Treasury were called before the committee and stated it was all right to let people buy those reparation bonds in the United States at around 90, at which they were offered. The State and Treasury Departments had been visited by this international banking group and received a clearance. They finally went down to 22. They are now in the forties somewhere; but the American people were deceived in the purchase of those securities, because, as I pointed out at the time, those securities and other German securities were not legally issued.

The Dawes bonds are now listed on the New York Stock Exchange and dealt in by that exchange. The security that was back of those bonds has been removed, so there is nothing now but the plain guaranty of the German Government back of them. Those cases were purely cases where the Martin Act of New York should have protected the American people, but no action was taken. The administrators of that act always accept the statements of the powerful international group of bankers.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN] has expired.

Mr. PARKER of New York. I yield 5 additional minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN].

Mr. McFADDEN. It is just impossible to attempt to cover this subject in another 5 minutes. Those are instances, and there are many others in regard to the issue of domestic securities.

This question of the reorganization of industry in the United States, which has been carried on by the private investment bankers, who in turn are hooked up with the financial institutions in New York, should have been supervised to a greater extent than they have been, and I think that the administration of the laws of New York State has been very derelict in this respect.

One of the things we must guard against in the issuance of these securities and in this particular legislation we are at fault still in that, because I do not believe that, as well and carefully thought out as this measure is, it will do the thing we want to do. We want to protect the innocent investor from the sale and purchase of fraudulent securities, or securities that are not properly secured. So I say these institutions and the organization of these bankers, which emit those securities before selling them to the public, have the best corporation attorneys that are available; men who are versed in knowing how near they can go to the hair line and not go over on the other side. We must pay our respects to those lawyers who engineer these developments for the issuing houses and who guide those institutions, not only the companies whose securities are to be issued but the distributing houses. They know just how far they can go and they go just about to that line and sometimes they go over, and the public is cheated. We hire lawyers to protect us from other lawyers. Those law firms are just as responsible as are some of the investment houses, and should be held responsible under the law. I sometimes think they are more responsible, because they furnish the brains.

I am wondering whether in our attempt now we are really going to the meat of this situation, because we are leaving open still the possibility of the men in the investment house selling those bonds through financial institutions and then to the public, where they will not have the opportunity of detection until a loss has occurred. I am afraid salesmen will sell unworthy securities as approved by the Government.

Mr. MARLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. I yield.

Mr. MARLAND. Would it not add to the safety of the public if the investment banking houses were prohibited from sitting on the boards of corporations, manufacturing securities and selling them to themselves, to be sold to the public?

Mr. McFADDEN. The gentleman is absolutely correct. May I say to the House that the gentleman who has just interrupted me has been the victim of manipulations of houses that have issued a great many of the securities where the public has been mulcted. The gentleman himself is a victim of that situation. It is too bad that the committee could not have listened to the suggestions and put into this bill some of the things which the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MARLAND] has suggested. He is entirely right.

Mr. EVANS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. I yield.

Mr. EVANS. Does the gentleman know of anyone who has not been? [Laughter.]

Mr. McFADDEN. Honest confession is good for the soul. [Laughter.] I am sorry the gentleman is one of those. It is simply a question of the degree.

What I am getting at is this—the question by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MARLAND] has prompted this: There are, sitting on the boards of the big banks, partners in international financial houses and domestic houses who have been engaged in the distribution of domestic and foreign securities. Those men, or their partners, or those whom they control, have men sitting on the boards of banks, insurance companies, all sorts of trusts, and things of that nature, and those connections are there for the purpose of distributing their underwritings and their securities. This has been a very prolific source of distribution of securities by these big houses and has often been a source under which great losses and inferior securities have been unloaded.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN] has again expired.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of Washington. Mr. Chairman, it is with some trepidation that I address the Committee following the able and distinguished gentlemen who have spoken in regard to the legislation we are considering at this time. However, I am very deeply interested in the subject before us.

A few years ago in my part of the country, in the State of Oregon adjoining the State of Washington in which I live, we had a failure of one of the largest brokerage houses in that section of the country, involving several millions of dollars. I became one of counsel in that case and a protracted litigation ensued, lasting for several years. In the course of that litigation I had brought home to me a great many facts and much information pertaining to the sale of securities and the operations of the New York Stock Exchange of which I otherwise never would have learned.

I am in hearty accord with this measure. It will be a forward stride and will protect the American public and the buyers of securities. However, it will not reach evils from which the American people have suffered in recent years and from which they are still suffering.

The manipulation of securities after they have been issued embraces and constitutes a greater evil than those arising from the original issue of the securities. I refer to the vicious and criminal practices indulged in by stockbrokers, but which are possible under the rules and regulations of the New York Stock Exchange. These should be dealt with by Congress.

One of the worst evils is that of short selling, in which operation securities are sold that are not actually owned and possessed by the vendor. This practice is often resorted to in the manipulation of stocks that are being sold on the New York Stock Exchange. Another evil is that of "washed sales", where a group of men seeking to bring about a rise or seeking to depress the price of securities conspire and make fictitious sales through different brokerage houses, selling these stocks to each other, in this way affecting the quotations of the stocks.

A third evil is that of marginal sales, selling securities on margin. Under this plan the broker requires the buyer to pay a very small portion of the selling price of the security subject to a demand, or call, for additional margin. This acts as a snare or a trap, and a great many people buy more stocks than they can afford to buy, and when the call for additional margin comes their accounts are wiped out. Undoubtedly more money was lost by the American public because of marginal sales in the stock collapse of 1929 than on account of insufficiency of value in the securities when they were originally issued. Anyone who has studied the subject will bear me out in this statement, I am sure. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I am very much interested in this bill because I do not think there is a Member of this House who has come in contact with more unfortunate victims of fraudulent securities during the past few years than I. I have seen men and women, old and bent with age, suffer the loss of their life savings as the result of purchasing fraudulent worthless stocks from bankers and others engaged in the selling of securities.

I am only sorry that this bill does not include bankers in the sale of their own stock and securities. I think the very teeth of the bill have been extracted, because bankers are excluded in this respect.

It is rather peculiar that every time we have a piece of legislation presented to either the House or the Senate, important legislation affecting organized wealth and big bankers, we find that the teeth of every measure that would protect the public against their crooked manipulation have been taken out. We find that these titans of finance constantly sit quietly behind the scenes not only in the House but in the Senate as well and veto every financial measure which seeks to throw the light of publicity upon their dishonest activities. The court records of the Nation disclose that during the past few years the most colossal, gigantic crooks that have ever swindled the public in the history of this Nation have been the big bankers. It is a matter of common knowledge and I am sorry the teeth that would tend to grip and expose the financial giants have been taken out of this bill.

Within the last few months I tried a case in which an influential high officer of a bank obtained from a poor man his life savings by selling to him securities he either knew or, in the exercise of due care, ought to have known were worthless.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? I will yield him another minute.

Mr. CANNON of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. RAYBURN. The gentleman knows, if he has read the bill, that a transaction like that is not exempted in this bill. Nothing like that is exempted under this bill.

Mr. CANNON of Wisconsin. I understand bankers are exempt under this bill?

Mr. RAYBURN. No.

Mr. CANNON of Wisconsin. Those engaging in the banking business are exempt.

Mr. RAYBURN. Not at all.

Mr. CANNON of Wisconsin. I have read the bill. I understand that bankers are exempt under the bill.

Mr. RAYBURN. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. MOTT. Did the transaction of which the gentleman speaks take place entirely within his own State?

Mr. CANNON of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. MOTT. Is it the gentleman's idea that such a transaction comes within the purview of this legislation?

Mr. CANNON of Wisconsin. Oh, no; I am just citing that as an illustration of the activity of some of our bankers.

Mr. MOTT. May I ask the gentleman another question?

Mr. CANNON of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. MOTT. In view of what the gentleman has said about that case, may I inquire what kind of blue sky law the gentleman has in his State?

Mr. CANNON of Wisconsin. We have practically the same law in our State that they have in every other State.

Mr. MOTT. Is it a blue sky law or securities law that covers conditions precedent in the sale of securities?

Mr. CANNON of Wisconsin. Yes; we have a commission that passes on the soundness of stocks.

Mr. MOTT. Then you should have secured a conviction.

Mr. CANNON of Wisconsin. We should have had a conviction in the criminal court, but if demand was made on the district attorney the influence of the banker would be so great that a warrant would not be issued. We therefore had to resort to civil prosecution, and after the jury had brought in a verdict holding the officer of the bank guilty of fraud in the representations made in the sale of the securities and before the judgment could be collected, the bank became insolvent and the man lost everything.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Does the gentleman doubt the word of the chairman and the members of the committee when they say that bankers are not exempt?

Mr. CANNON of Wisconsin. I understood that bankers are exempt.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. The gentleman said he had read the bill.

Mr. CANNON of Wisconsin. I read the important portions of it.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. It has been stated here several times that bankers are not exempt.

Mr. BOILEAU. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Wisconsin. I yield.

Mr. BOILEAU. As I understand the provision with respect to bankers, it applies to the sale of their own stocks and securities.

Mr. RAYBURN. The securities issued by a bank are exempt, but when a banker sells a security he is just as responsible as anybody else.

Mr. CANNON of Wisconsin. Why should it not cover the securities issued by the bank?

Mr. RAYBURN. Because the United States Government, through its examiners and State officials, is supervising these banks, and it has been complained that we are going into fields where we had no business. We also exempted the stocks and bonds of railroads, and they do not come under this bill, because they are already supervised by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. CANNON of Wisconsin. Well, they are not properly supervised, and I think the gentleman will agree with me on that.

Mr. RAYBURN. Which ones?

Mr. CANNON of Wisconsin. Both the banks and the railroads, with respect to the sale of their securities.

Mr. RAYBURN. With respect to that matter, the gentleman should offer an amendment to some other law.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes.

Mr. CANNON of Wisconsin. Understand, I am in favor of this bill. I think it will render a tremendous safeguard to the masses of the poor people of our Nation. In my humble judgment it is probably the most important bill that has been submitted at this session of Congress, especially in view of the fact that during the past 10 or 11 years over $50,000,000,000 worth of securities have been sold throughout the United States, hundreds of millions worth to poor men and women who turned over their life savings, and the records disclose and the committee reports show that at least $25,000,000,000 of these securities were either absolutely worthless or grossly false representations were made at the time of their sale with respect to the financial stability of those securities.

I believe this is a bill that is going to save hundreds and hundreds of millions of dollars in the future of the life savings of the masses of our poor laboring people throughout the Nation, and I am whole-heartedly for the bill, but I am only sorry it is not broad enough to include bankers and railroads in every respect without excepting them in any instance, not even in the sale of their own stocks or securities. [Applause.]

Mr. PARKER of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ARENS].

Mr. ARENS. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this bill is to prevent misrepresentation in the sale of stocks and bonds to an unsuspecting public.

I do not believe for one minute the President in his message, or the committee when it brought in this bill, wanted to include in the bill the cooperative organizations. The stocks of cooperative organizations, as the bill now reads, will be subject to the provisions of the bill. They are hardly ever sold to the public as a whole, but are sold to individuals who deal in products that are intended to be handled by the cooperatives. To subject the cooperatives to the provisions of this bill would be a hardship.

If you will read the provisions at the end of this bill, you find they have to file an extensive statement with the Commission, wait 30 days before a permit to sell stocks can be issued, and then they are compelled to pay a filing fee of $50.

I had several conversations with members of the committee yesterday and today and none of them has any objection to exempting cooperatives from the provisions of the bill. However, it is too late to have this remedied. I was not personally aware that the provisions of this bill would affect cooperatives until yesterday, when I received a letter from the National Cooperative Council, of which my organization, Land O'Lakes, Inc., is a member, and which represents most of the cooperatives of the United States. The letter was from Judge Miller, the counsel of the New York Dairymen's League, who is president of the council. Part of the letter is as follows:

A reading of the securities bill, presumably to be considered shortly in the House, indicates that its provisions were probably not intended to affect securities issued by cooperatives, yet I see no provision which would exempt them.

He therefore suggests an amendment in his closing paragraph, as follows:

May I therefore request your serious consideration to securing an amendment to the securities bill which would exempt stocks, bonds, or certificates of indebtedness issued by farmers and fruit growers, or like associations organized and operated on a cooperative basis for the purpose and subject to the conditions prescribed in paragraphs 12, 13, and 14, of section 103, of the Revenue Act of 1932.

I have looked up the revenue act referred to. It is the act that provides for the income tax and other taxes and it defines very carefully what a cooperative is. So there need not be any fear about that, that some so-called "cooperatives" which should come under the regulations of this act would also be exempted.

I am pleased to say that this noon I asked a question of the chairman of the committee while he explained the bill in the Committee of the Whole, and he indicated he would have no objection to accepting such an amendment in conference if I were successful in having it added in the Senate. I shall make an attempt to have the committee of the Senate adopt such an amendment, and therefore I have asked for these few minutes to make this explanation to the House. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KELLER].

CREATING A SACRED CIRCLE AROUND THE HOUSE OF THIEVES

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, first I want to congratulate the House for having heard from the chairman of the committee a statement of the facts justifying this bill, the like of which I have never heard before in one short address. I hope the gentleman will publish it in a pamphlet form, so that it may be for general use over the country, because of the immense amount of information contained in it.

Next, we seem to get the idea here that we are discussing a new subject. There never was a greater mistake than that. This is an old subject. It was already an old crime in 1909. Chief Justice Hughes, then Governor of New York, had an investigation of this very important subject made by a powerful committee, the report of which ought to be read by every man who wants to be informed about the subject.

THE PUJO COMMITTEE

Then the Congress of the United States in 1912 had an investigation made by what is known as the "Pujo Committee" of this House. I hold in my hand a copy of the report of that committee, that was printed in 1913. It sets out all the difficulties that have been set out before us here today. It proposes the proper remedy. It presents a legal brief that will instruct any man who wants information. It suggests and furnishes the legal authority to prevent the things which we have had to endure on a terrible scale during the last three and a half years.

The panic of 1907 was inexcusable, as also were the panics of 1921 and 1929, and also they were all as inexcusable as the panics of 1893 and 1873, because there was absolutely no excuse, and never has been, for permitting any of the procession of panics that have so often devastated this young, vigorous Nation, growing up in the country of the greatest possible natural resources. Every one of these panics have been followed by business depressions, destructive of industry to a terrible degree.

Mr. Melvin A. Traylor, president of the First National Bank of Chicago, in his address before the International Chamber of Commerce here in Washington City 2 years ago said:

I am not an economist, but I must admit that at least the last three panics were all precipitated by crashes on the New York Stock Exchange.

It took courage for a banker to say this. His whole address on this occasion is a notable contribution to progressive thought. It ought to be read by every Member of the Congress.

I happened to know Mr. Traylor, and at that time I was at work on a book on this subject, one chapter of which I have here in my hand. I wrote to him, saying that not only was that statement true with relation to the last three panics, but that it was also true in relation to the panics of ninety-three and seventy-three.

Now, all the conditions we have before us we had also in all those panics since the Civil War, except insofar as the extent of them is concerned. At that time we began to use labor-saving machinery on a very large scale. As our chairman pointed out, the increase of corporations ensued to a tremendous extent. And I point out that gambling in stocks increased just as the number of shares increased. The principle underlying the previous panics was not different from the last one, except that they were on a smaller scale and a smaller number of victims involved.

THE RULE FOR PANICS

I repeat a rule for you, if I may, and that is that every panic in this country, with its inevitably ensuing depression, has been precipitated by a stock crash on the New York Stock Exchange. To that rule there is no exception, and the extent and intensity of the depressions were foreshadowed exactly by the intensity and scope of the stock crashes themselves.

SHOULD INCLUDE PRESENT STOCKS AND BONDS

I am sorry that we have not the opportunity of including present stock issues under the provisions of this bill. They ought to be included for the reason that if we go on without prohibiting the fraud on people on stocks and bonds already listed, we are leaving the same gang in control that has been in control with exactly the same opportunity of robbing the people of this country just as they have been doing heretofore.

The effect of not including those stocks at present listed on the stock exchanges is to place the stamp of approval of the Congress upon them. In other words, we are placed in a position of saying to the American people: "We will protect you against any future fraud in the sale of securities, but you must take your own chance against those now listed on the exchanges. We believe that these stocks and bonds are all O.K."

We are supposed to act upon measures before us with intelligence, yet no intelligent man would set his stamp of approval upon any security without a thorough analysis of the value behind it, and we refuse him that opportunity on one security and afford it on another.

Schedule A of this bill enumerates 32 qualifications which must be met to the satisfaction of the Federal Trade Commission before authority will be granted for the sale of any new security. If these qualifications are important, and they are, why should they not be met by securities now on the market, regardless of their date of issue?

ARE THERE MORE KREUGERS AND INSULLS?

Who is there among us able to say that we shall not tomorrow be faced with another Krueger or Insull? Undoubtedly there are others; the nefarious influence of these two erstwhile gentlemen is too widespread for comfort on the part of investors. Why do we not take this opportunity to guarantee to the American investing public that there shall be no further fraud perpetrated upon them? Why are we so eager to protect a few and unwilling to protect the many? What honest man will object?

Do you think that the same outfit that engineered the stock panic of 1929 cannot and will not do it again unless the law prevents it?

Unless we include the issues of stocks and bonds presently on the market we shall create a sacred ring around the "house of thieves."

Mr. REILLY. What would the gentleman write into the bill to do that?

Mr. KELLER. I am very glad the gentleman has asked me that question. There are eight things I set out in my book on that subject.

First. I would compel responsible incorporation under the law of all stock exchanges.

Second. I would prevent the payment of a higher rate of interest on call loans, either directly or indirectly by commissions or otherwise, than the statutory rate of interest in the State where the stock-exchange is located.

Third. I would compel brokers, operators, banks, and their promotional affiliates to assume financial responsibility for their statements in newspapers, advertisements, prospectus, or for other propaganda for the selling of stock.

Fourth. I would compel promotional institutions to assume responsibility for the statements of all their agents.

Fifth. The right to have the shares of any corporation dealt in on the stock exchange is a privilege at present arbitrarily held by the very brokers who buy and sell these same shares. The power to list or refuse to list a stock is capable of such abuse, and has so often been shamelessly abused that it cannot longer be left in the hands of the stock exchange. It is necessary therefore that those companies desiring to have their stocks listed on the stock exchange, and who are thereby given the privilege of having them dealt in on a Nation-wide scale shall have the right to come into a proper court of national jurisdiction and, by making proper showing have their stocks listed on the stock exchange by order of the court.

Sixth. I would prevent banks from owning or having any interest in affiliates or promotional organizations, either through interlocking directorates or otherwise.

Seventh. I would compel brokers to keep actual records of all transactions in the names of the actual parties at interest. I would make it a crime to use an assumed name in stock transactions.

Eighth. I would make the infraction of any of these laws a crime involving compulsory imprisonment.

H.R. 4365 OFFERS GREATER PROTECTION

I have had before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce a bill, H.R. 4365, that would accomplish the things I have just set forth.

THE PANIC OF 1873

The conditions which precede and follow any panic are the same that precede and follow all panics. The procedure is simple. Let us set out the conditions which preceded and followed the panic of 1873: General prosperity prevailed; there were very few business or bank failures; money in actual use was plentiful, and credit was easily obtained; profits in business were good; labor was well employed; everybody was at work and spending money; not a cloud was on the business sky; every justifiable reason why prosperity should continue indefinitely; speculation on the stock market had put stocks up; new issues of stock were listed on the stock exchanges; many of the "big ones" sold out toward the top of the market. Then short selling precipitated a full-fledged panic on the New York Stock Exchange; stock prices collapsed; credit was destroyed; bank failures started; panic spread to all business; unemployment, poverty, misery, and crime followed; industrial paralysis set in; the inevitable Nation-wide depression ensued; Government officials and leading financiers assured the country that the condition was purely temporary; that business would pick up in the spring; that the business of the country was sound; that the depression could not last; and the newspapers repeated this "hopeful stuff that dreams are made out of." But with all this reassurance, business failure, uncertainty, fear, lost confidence, and lack of enterprise, characterized the long years of recovery—"starving through" by the people who had no part in precipitating the panic. After some years of toil, shamelessly imposed upon them by the greed of others, the people paid the terrible costs of the panic of 1873. Nobody did anything about it. Nobody tried to find out what brought the panic. Nobody tried to prevent the coming of other panics. So, of course, other panics came.

THE PANICS OF 1893, 1907, 1921

The panic of 1893 came about under the same conditions and brought the same results as the panic of 1873. The panic of 1907 fits the description precisely, both in its approach and outcome. The panic of 1921 was distinguished from the other three solely by having had governmental aid and cooperation through the stupid or criminal use of the Federal Reserve System in "deflating" the currency and credits of the country.

THE PANIC OF 1929

The same conditions preceded the panic of 1929, and the same financial chaos, unemployment, poverty, and starvation followed it, with the Federal Reserve System again helping the stock gamblers, both before and after the panic. It will be noted that the stock panic on the New York Stock Exchange always brings a panic in industry, and through industry injures every man, woman, and child in America. Every panic inevitably brings in its train the condition known as business depression—the periods in which all the wrongs and abuses which produce panics are expiated. Here were five Nation-wide panics within a period of 57 years, literally destructive of the rights of men, and, calculated at present price levels, they have cost us more than our total national wealth, yet the United States Government has taken little interest in what caused these panics and has not at all investigated the means of preventing their recurrence. We appear to have concluded that nothing can be done about it.

The reason for bringing about the panic of 1907, the methods of conducting it on the New York Stock Exchange, and the disastrous results of it to the whole country constituted such a flagrant crime against society that the United States Senate in 1908 started an investigation of "wash sales"; that is, of bogus sales made for the purpose of misleading and defrauding the people. Abuses along this line were so palpable, and the evidence so indisputable, that the representatives of the New York Stock Exchange appeared before the Senate committee and agreed to prevent the continuance of that abuse. The investigation was therefore stopped and no record kept of the matter. But after 24 years the same practice in a different form, true enough, was, in the evidence produced before the Senate committee of the Seventy-second Congress (1932) under the chairmanship of Senator NORBECK, shown still to exist on a very large scale.

When the downright dishonesty, chicanery, thievery, and conspiracy to cheat and defraud which for so long a time has controlled and now does control the stock exchanges of the country are for a certainty done away with, we shall find the very conditions which business security demands and which all honest men want. The American people under conditions of reasonable national income save out of their earnings as much as $7,000,000,000 a year.

LEGITIMATE CAPITAL REQUIRED

The permanent improvements which the expansion of business requires for the continued development of the country must necessarily get legitimate capital from the savings from industry, not from the continual extending of credit. The people who save have a right to invest their money in the best securities—actual securities—which America has. They will do this gladly when they know they are putting their money into actual things worth as an honest investment what they are asked to pay. The buying and selling of this class of securities would soon bring into the market all the capital necessary to carry on the Nation's business. The honest handling of this immense amount of stored-up energy for the benefit of America, in the interest of the individual producer, at a fair profit to the legitimate broker would be the inspiring business of the stock exchanges of the near future, which must grow directly out of the present stock exchanges, or which will succeed their necessary destruction, if they further refuse to be reformed.

HONEST BUSINESS DOES NOT REQUIRE SECRECY

Open the books. Honest business does not require secrecy. Crooked business should not be permitted to profit by secrecy. Business must come with clean hands into court of humanity before it can claim the protection of that court. This is a very moderate program, in full keeping with our past experiences, with our system of government; its adoption will eliminate the causes of our present misfortunes. It will be attacked by those interests which are fighting to keep control. But it will be well for those interests to consider that 13,000,000 idle men are not going to remain idle. They have been wonderfully patient under the shameless conditions of the past three and a half years. Patience sometimes ceases to be a virtue. To this day and generation has come the ability to see and understand the causes which have underlain and moved men in government throughout all history—and the opportunity to reinterpret those principles in the interest of humanity.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. PARKER of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GIBSON].

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Chairman, personal greed has to a great extent directed the Nation's business and credit for years, exploited and taken advantage of the people, and has endeavored to run the country through control of political parties. Its apostles were aptly characterized by another Roosevelt as malefactors of great wealth.

This measure serves to discourage dishonest practices in the sale of securities; takes from the scheming banker and broker one source of tainted income and offers a measure of protection from unscrupulous financiers. When the basic idea back of it is clothed in proper legal form the measure should pass without a dissenting vote.

The true picture of the conditions that make the passage of this measure a necessity records a sordid, sorry, and grotesque mess.

The fact that we are passing through a grave crisis is known to everyone. It needs no repetition here. We are in disagreement as to the main predisposing cause; but we can, however, see some of the contributing causes.

Our country has been under attack from two classes of enemies, the criminal who breaks the law for private gain and the man who, under the cover of the law, has by false representation taken the savings of his less fortunate fellow men. These two classes may be comprehended by that modern term "racketeers." They have, to use a common expression, "bled the country white."

Crimes such as burglary, robbery, larceny, and fraud are costing the people of the country more than $10,000,000,000 annually.

We are just coming to an understanding of the methods of operation and results of the work of the international bankers and the heads of great banking institutions. We were duly warned by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN], but we did not heed it.

The true picture before us shows the international banker and his agents during prosperous times sitting on the doorsteps of European and South American governments begging for contracts to float their impaired and worthless securities and to sell them to our unsuspecting home folks just for personal gain from commissions and manipulations. Even investment bankers of this country, following the bad example, sent out a horde of solicitors to secure questionable local bonds to work off onto the public. The game was played to the limit. In one case at least a New York banking house, supposed to be a reputable institution, resorted to bribery to secure an issue of South American bonds, and the bankers who put them out knew they were worthless. Local bankers took them and sold them to their patrons, well knowing if they did not do so their credit facilities would be curtailed. No less reprehensible was the conduct of our financiers in rigging the stock market to work off on to the people stocks at many times their real value. Read the available hearings that set forth the facts and see how the people were buncoed.

Into this same class of malefactors we may place the public-utility operators who wrote up the purchase price of their system units into capitalization and charged rates to net them 7 percent on values that never existed. They built up empires of business out of their ill-gotten gains and took billions of dollars from trusting investors.

It appears in the report that out of $50,000,000,000 of securities value sold to the American people during the past 10 years $25,000,000,000 of them were worthless and, therefore, represent a loss of that amount. This is one of the main contributing causes of the depression. Such practices should never have been permitted in America.

I believe that if the President does nothing more in his administration than to protect the people from such practices he will merit their everlasting gratitude and make for himself a secure place in the list of American Executives.

We are coming to a common understanding of the situation. The result of the last election was long in the making. The party to which I belong was given the reputation of being the servant of big business. That reputation came to be shared in all sections of the country and the voters determined to bring about a new deal because of it.

If the Republican Party gets back into power, it will be on the basis that it renders better service to the common run of folks than the Democratic Party. It must be made the party of service to the common man. Let me warn my party leaders that they cannot regain favor through men who are out of step with the ideals of the day. We must take the next Republican candidate for the Presidency from Main Street. He must be a man who knows the needs of the people and whose heart beats in sympathy with them. This is not the appeal of a radical. It is a statement of facts and common-sense political advice.

Let me say to the members of the Democratic Party, if you allow the same influences to gain control, you will some day find yourselves in the same straits that now confront our party members. Remember that the apostles of greed do not care which party is in power so long as they are in control of it.

These racketeers have broken down the capitalistic system, challenged the future of civilization, practically wrecked business, and placed the world on the edge of a volcano.

I am not criticizing the Republican Party as a party. My criticism is of those who have attempted to use it as a means of personal gain. The fine principles that inspired its birth must be preserved. Its future course must be so shaped that it will again command the confidence of the people. In former years it has been their servant, the champion of the rights of those who dwell in the millions of humble homes and whose hopes and fears have been grouped around the family hearthstone.

Under the guiding hand of party policies a great nation was builded, and during its control after the War between the States we witnessed a commercial development that amazed the world. The scattered States of the continent were united into one indissoluble Union. It was made the world's leader of thought and action. Then came what we may well call the pirate crew that substituted personal greed for patriotism and carried our party into the depths of ill repute with the voters of the country. This makes it necessary for the faithful, in these days of storm and stress, to hold the lines, build from within, and again make it the party of Abraham Lincoln and the party of Theodore Roosevelt, the outstanding champions of the rights of the people.

It is futile to deny that we are passing into a new era; into a period when groups that have taken advantage of their brothers will be held in check. It will be an age of strength among those who have been led rather than among those who lead. We are in the midst of great moving forces. Let us speed the hopeful day of return to the principles of common honesty in the relations of man with man by the passage of this measure.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LOZIER].

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Chairman, it so happens that when the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BECK] began his address this morning, I had before me and had been reading the Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States, by John Randolph Tucker, and by strange coincidence I had before me Mr. Tucker's reference to the case of Paul v. Virginia (8 Wall. 168), to which my colleague, Mr. BECK, referred in his very able and exceedingly interesting discussion. I want to call attention to what Mr. Tucker, one of the greatest students of our Federal Constitution, had to say apropos this question. I quote from page 556 of volume 2:

The question has been mooted whether Congress can regulate negotiable instruments, interstate and foreign, and whether they constitute commerce within this clause. We have seen that an interstate bill of lading is beyond the power of a State to regulate, because such action would be a regulation of commerce. But this is the regulation of an instrument which connects itself with the thing which is in transitu interstate or to foreign countries. But could the contract involved in negotiable paper be the subject of regulation by Congress? Upon this there are no decisions, but a negative answer to the question is strongly confirmed by the late case of Hooper v. California, citing the opinion in Paul v. Virginia, and other cases.

The decision in the case of Paul against Virginia was handed down in 1868, and was written by Justice Field.

The case involved the construction of a statute of Virginia that prohibited an insurance company not incorporated under the laws of that State from carrying on an insurance business within the Commonwealth of Virginia without previously obtaining a license for that purpose, to which license it was not entitled until it deposited with the State treasury bonds of a certain specified character and amount.

The defendant, Paul, a resident of Virginia, as the agent of a New York insurance company, undertook to transact an insurance business for this foreign insurance corporation without said company or Paul having complied with the Virginia statute. Paul was indicted for the violation of this statute, and on conviction was sentenced to pay a fine of $50. In due course the case reached the Supreme Court on a writ of error.

The validity of the Virginia statute was assailed on the ground that it was in conflict with that clause in the Constitution which declares that—

The citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens of the several States—

And that it was also violative of the clause which declares that Congress shall have power—to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the States.

The Supreme Court affirmed the conviction of Paul, sustained the validity of the Virginia statute, and held that the issuing of a policy of insurance is not a transaction of commerce within the meaning of the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution, and further, that the Virginia statute did not violate the "privileges and immunities" provision of the Constitution.

In substance, the court held that issuing a policy of insurance is not a transaction of commerce. The policies are simple contracts of indemnity against loss by fire, entered into between the corporations and the assured, for a consideration paid by the latter. These contracts are not articles of commerce in any proper meaning of the word. They are not subjects of trade and barter offered in the market as something having an existence and value independent of the parties to them. They are not commodities to be shipped or forwarded from one State to another, and then put up for sale.

In the course of his opinion Justice Field said that these insurance policies do not constitute a part of the commerce between the States any more than a contract for the purchase and sale of goods in Virginia by a citizen of New York while in Virginia would constitute a portion of such commerce. The court quoted with approval Nathan v. Louisiana (8 How. 73), in which it was held that a law of that State imposing a tax on money and exchange brokers who dealt entirely in the purchase and sale of foreign bills of exchange was not in conflict with the constitutional power of Congress to regulate commerce. The individual thus using his money and credit, said the court—is not engaged in commerce but in supplying an instrument of commerce.

And although these foreign bills of exchange are instruments of commerce, they are the subjects of State regulation and, inferentially, they may be subjects of direct State taxation.

Continuing, the court, speaking through Justice Field, said:

The Federal Government can no more regulate the commerce of a State than the State can regulate the commerce of the Federal Government, and domestic bills or promissory notes are as necessary to the commerce of a State as foreign bills to the commerce of the Union. And if a tax on an exchange broker who deals in foreign bills be a regulation of foreign commerce among the States, much more would a tax upon State paper by Congress, be a tax on the commerce of a State.

In Hooper v. California (155 U.S. 648) the Supreme Court cited and followed the doctrine announced in Paul v. Virginia.

In discussing the scope and application of the commerce clause Mr. Tucker says that the regulatory power of Congress has been extended to embrace contracts as to things in commerce, as correspondence by telegraph, and so forth. Though invented long after the commerce clause was formulated, but as the telegraphs are but new forms of commerce of persons and things, the power embraces commerce through those means as it had done through the old and superseded means.

The power is not changed by the increase of its domain by reason of the advance of scientific investigation. In regulating commerce, therefore, Congress regulates traffic in things in transitu but not things themselves.

I merely wish to call your attention to the fact that so far there is no unequivocal and clear-cut rule established by our Supreme Court as to what extent the Federal Government can regulate transactions in the sale and transfer of securities. In my humble opinion the provisions of the pending bill, if challenged, will be held constitutional, if for no other reason on the principle of ex necessitate rei; that is, from the necessities of the case. Any other construction would not be in keeping with our exceedingly complex and rapidly changing social and economic institutions.

In the few minutes allotted me I cannot discuss this bill in detail, but I am whole-heartedly in favor of it. I believe it is constructive legislation, the beneficial effect of which it will be difficult to overappraise. I have been in this House 10 years and have heard some very able, convincing, and logical presentations of measures, but I have not heard a more lucid, convincing, persuasive, and compelling presentation of a bill than we heard this morning from our distinguished colleague, Mr. RAYBURN, the Chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. [Applause.] He and his committee have rendered their country a worth-while service.

If this bill had been passed 10 years ago and rigorously enforced, $14,000,000,000 of hard-earned American money would not have been taken from our productive industries and from our marts of trade and commerce in the United States, and invested in frozen European securities.

In February and March 1925, in a series of seven speeches, I called attention to the facts that each year billions of dollars of American capital was being sent abroad as loans to foreign nations, foreign provinces, foreign municipalities, foreign railroads, foreign industries, and foreign utilities. I warned against the evil effects and inevitable disaster that would follow this wild investment in foreign lands. I argued that these loans would probably never be repaid, or, if ever repaid, then only after several decades of delinquency. I protested against the action of the Harding and Coolidge administrations in approving and acting as a wet nurse in the making of these loans abroad and in the flotation and sale of these worthless foreign securities.

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LOZIER. In just a moment.

In 1925, in the month of February, I made seven addresses on this floor, in which I protested against the policy of lending private capital abroad with the sanction and approval of the State Department.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LOZIER] has expired.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes.

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LOZIER. I yield.

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. In the annual report of the Department of Commerce for 1928, page 135, I find the following:

A record-breaking volume of foreign stocks and bonds was offered to the American investing public last year. This partly explains the increased use made of the store of information on the finances of foreign governments and corporations that is on file in the Bureau. American underwriters of foreign securities are now turning to the finance and investment division in constantly growing numbers for data to guide them in foreign financial commitments.

The services of this division, from their nature, are not easily measured in dollars and cents. Though closely associated with important financial transactions, the division can take no active part in promoting them. It operates in a field where the greatest service is often rendered by furnishing detailed, accurate information not readily obtainable elsewhere.

As a result of this alleged service of a Government department, large issues of bonds of foreign governments were purchased by the American investing public, perhaps because of this advice, which has turned out to be very questionable.

Does not the gentleman believe that the American investing public will be induced to invest its money in issues of stocks and bonds that may be called sound by a bureau of this character? Because issues of stocks and bonds had the approval of such a Government organization, as was the case with the Commerce Department in 1928, causes many people to invest; the very approval of the Government to an issue of stock will cause citizens to buy it, who otherwise would be afraid to buy. I cannot believe the good will result that the gentleman anticipates.

Mr. LOZIER. May I say to the gentleman that the wisdom and value of any law is in its sympathetic and wise administration. A good law may be maladministered and become an agency of destruction and disaster. A law of doubtful merit, if sympathetically and wisely administered, may be helpful.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LOZIER] has again expired.

Mr. RAYBURN. I yield the gentleman 1 additional minute.

Mr. LOZIER. As far back as February 1925 I called attention to the fact that these foreign securities were being floated and sold to the unsuspecting public with the express approval of our State Department, Commercial and Financial Chronicle, and I exhibited letters from Blair & Co., Dow Jones & Co., National City Co., Morgan & Co., Dillon, Reed & Co., of New York, the Equitable Trust Co., Moody Investment Service, and other international bankers in reply to my letters, in which they stated that before attempting to float any foreign securities in America or offering them to the investing public they had obtained the permission of the State Department for the flotation and sale.

My statement was challenged by George Harvey, former Ambassador to London, who was then editor of the Washington Post, and he called upon me for proof that the administrations had a part in the flotation and sale of these foreign bonds, aggregating billions of dollars. On March 3, 1925, the RECORD shows that I produced and included in my remarks letters from those great international bankers, in which they said that the sale of all the securities which they had floated in America was authorized by the State Department. I called attention to a conference which President Harding had with the international bankers in Washington in May 1921, after which a statement was made public to the effect that thereafter foreign securities offered for sale in the United States must first be submitted to the State Department for approval. I called attention to the fact that we were taking this money out of productive industry; that we were reducing tremendously the amount of capital available for loans or business; that we were financing our industrial and commercial rivals; that we were rehabilitating the railroads, factories, and utilities of Europe; that we were financing our competitors and enabling them with their cheap labor to recapture the markets of the world, which we had won during the World War.

I am not referring to the war debts due to the United States from our former European allies. I am talking about the $14,000,000,000 of private capital that our international bankers loaned abroad under the Harding and Coolidge administrations. If you are interested in the genesis and evolution of this foreign-loan scandal, I suggest you scan the seven speeches I made in February and March 1925. You will find them in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, second session of the Sixty-eighth Congress, on pages 3267, 3669, 3917, 3995, 5137, 5424, and 5880. In each you will find some worth-while information, and if you read my remarks beginning on page 5880 you will first be interested, then amazed, and then indignant that the financial and political leaders of a great nation would be guilty of such monumental folly as marked the lending of 14 billion good American dollars in foreign lands. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LOZIER] has again expired.

Mr. PARKER of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. MOTT].

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, the discussion thus far has demonstrated again the utter futility and the farce of debating a bill of this kind under the gag rule. I agree with the gentleman from Missouri that the discussion of the bill has been interesting and enlightening, but nevertheless it has been entirely futile because we are not permitted under the rule to try to improve it; we cannot amend it, we can only take it or leave it just as it is written. I think if the debate upon this bill shows anything, it shows that a gag rule, whatever may be the claims for its justification in partisan matters, is entirely improper in connection with a bill of this kind. I desired very much to offer an amendment to this bill. Other gentlemen did also. And as I listened to the discussion for the last several hours, I came to the conclusion that almost every suggestion that has been offered here in the course of the debate would, if incorporated in the bill in the shape of an amendment, have improved the bill.

I am going to vote for this bill, of course. I doubt if there will be one dissenting vote in the House. But I am going to vote for it, not because I think it is a good securities bill, for I do not, but because I know that it is the only securities bill we shall be permitted to vote on this session. I doubt very much if there is a State securities commissioner in the United States who would undertake from his knowledge of securities regulation to endorse this bill as an adequate remedy for the evils arising out of the sale of securities in interstate commerce. The reason is that this bill omits the very feature which is necessary to make any securities bill effective and workable, and that is the requirement that before an issuer or dealer may offer his security for sale he must qualify that security with the governmental agency which is intrusted with the administration of the act, and must secure from that governmental agency a permit to offer that security in interstate commerce. This bill omits that feature entirely, and it omits it purposely, as the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. WOLVERTON] has stated. It is my opinion that because it does omit it, it will fail of its purpose, just as every State securities act which does not contain the permit feature has been a failure.

On the other hand, every State securities law which does make the issuance of a permit a condition precedent to the sale of securities has been a success. It has been effectively administered, and it has actually protected the investing public.

Now, what is the purpose of any securities regulatory law? Obviously it is to protect the investor. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. WOLVERTON] was entirely correct when he said there were two theories of protection of the investor by a regulatory securities statute.

My objection to this bill is that it is based upon the wrong theory. The first theory of the protection of investors in the sale of securities is based upon the proposition that worthless and illegitimate and fundamentally unsound securities should not be permitted to be sold at all, and that the investing public should be protected against them in the first instance by prohibiting their sale. The securities laws based upon this theory take into consideration several important facts. In the first place, it recognizes the fact that the average investor knows nothing about securities or securities transactions. He knows nothing about the financial structure of the corporations which issue securities. The average investor does not know how to read or interpret a balance sheet, even when he has all the facts before him which went into the make-up of the balance sheet.

It also takes into consideration another important factor, and that is that unless the average investor is protected against the worthless and fraudulent security by prohibition of its sale in the first instance, he has no remedy at all in 9 cases out of 10, because by the time he discovers he has been defrauded, the corporation from which he purchased the security will have become insolvent.

Under this theory of securities regulation, protection to the investor is afforded by investing the securities commissioner with authority to make an investigation of every security proposed to be sold. The scope of the investigation is unlimited and is made by a staff of experts trained in that particular field. Based upon his investigation, the law then imposes upon the commissioner the duty of determining whether the security examined is legitimate and offered in good faith. If it is, the commissioner may issue a permit authorizing its sale. If it is not, then it is his duty under the law to deny the permit. Thus is the investor protected from fraud in the first instance—the only instance, as experience has shown, where he can be given any real protection at all. By issuing a permit the State, of course, does not guarantee that the investor will not lose money, because even legitimate enterprises may, and often do, fail. Neither does the State in issuing a permit undertake to approve the security sold under it. It does undertake to say, however, that the security sold under the permit is at least a legitimate security, and that it is issued honestly and in good faith, and that the investor who buys it is not patronizing a financial racket operated for the very purpose of robbing the investor. This much the State should undertake to guarantee; and if it cannot do this much, then no securities law is of any practical value whatever.

The other theory of securities regulation—and the one upon which this bill is based—is that the sale of worthless, illegitimate, and fraudulent securities should not be prohibited in the first instance. That all that is necessary to properly protect the public and all the protection the public is properly entitled to is that the facts regarding the security offered shall be made known to the public through the filing of a certain statement and information regarding it with the governmental agency charged with the administration of the act. When that is done, then the law, under this theory, applies the old rule of caveat emptor and the seller is liable under the law only for actual legal fraud.

This theory ignores entirely the fact that the average investor cannot read and interpret a balance sheet. It ignores the fact that he is entirely unfamiliar with securities transactions and with the financial structures of the corporations issuing the paper. It ignores the fact that a balance sheet can be technically accurate and still convey to the untutored investor the idea that an unsound company is sound, and this without the risk of either civil or criminal liability on the part of the seller. And, finally, it completely ignores the most important factor of all: that in most cases the issuers of fraudulent securities cannot respond in a judgment, and that when the defrauded investor finally discovers the fraud his only remedy under this theory is a civil judgment which cannot be collected.

It has been estimated by securities commissioners in many States that fully 50 percent of the losses to investors have been through the purchase of securities in corporations which were insolvent at the time the securities were sold. The pending bill, when enacted, will do practically nothing toward protecting this class of investors because this bill does not undertake to prohibit the sale of any securities in the first instance, no matter how fraudulent they may be. All that is necessary is that the issuer file his statement, wait 30 days, and then go ahead and sell the stock.

You will recall that 2 or 3 times this afternoon I have asked gentlemen who were discussing this bill to explain how under it the bill would protect any person buying stock in companies like Insull, the Central Public Service Corporation, or the Foshay Co. None of them could explain how the bill would give any protection whatever to persons buying securities of this kind. The reason is that companies of this kind are financial rackets which a bill based upon this theory of regulation does not even undertake either to control or regulate. The companies I have mentioned could disclose to the commission every fact regarding their financial set-up which is required under this bill, and under the bill the Federal Trade Commission could not stop the sale of a single dollar's worth of their securities offered in interstate commerce. Every State securities commissioner whose State blue sky law does not contain the permit feature knows this to his sorrow. Every commissioner whose State securities law does contain the permit feature knows that with the permit club he can keep these racketeers out of his State, and that if by any chance they do succeed in robbing his people he can compel them to disgorge if he acts before such companies go bankrupt.

I have had a good deal to say about State securities laws and securities commissioners. The reason is that any Federal securities law is inseparably bound up with every State securities law. A Federal securities law is nothing more or less than an adaptation of a State securities law, or a class of State securities laws, to the regulation of the sale of securities in interstate commerce. Any proposal for a Federal securities law must of necessity be an adaptation of the regulatory features of some existing State law to traffic in securities between the States, because the existing State securities statutes in the aggregate constitute the entire corpus juris of securities regulation in this country. And that is what this bill is. My objection to it is that it has adapted the wrong class of blue sky laws to that purpose. It is an adaptation of the second theory of securities regulation, instead of the first. In its national scope, therefore, it must fail of much of its purpose, just as the class of State securities laws from which it is taken have already failed.

As I have stated, I intend to vote for this bill, because we need a Federal securities law, and this one is better than no law at all. But it is at least a start. As several gentlemen have said, "It is a step in the right direction." I do not think it is a very long step, but it is a step, nevertheless, and it may have a tendency to make some issuers and dealers who want to engage in interstate commerce a little more careful than they have been. It will, indeed, help to some extent the shrewd investor by making easily available to himself certain information which he would otherwise have to secure for himself through the various investment manuals and other sources of information at his command. It will not help the poor or the untutored investors, who are the ones who have suffered most from the operations of financial racketeers.

In time I hope this law may be amended so as to become a real Federal blue sky law, and I think eventually that will be done. I should like to have a law sometime that will protect in the first instance the average person who has saved his money and wants to invest it and who is now the legitimate prey of every interstate financial racketeer in the country. I want to do away with the rule of caveat emptor altogether where the sale of a fraudulent security is concerned. I want to make it impossible by law for any financial crook to operate in the United States.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. LAMBETH].

Mr. LAMBETH. Mr. Chairman, the pending Federal Securities Act embodies a purpose which must appeal to all of us who would protect our people from injustice and who seek the preservation of Americanism against internal poison no less than against external foes. I believe that it pursues that purpose wisely, judiciously, and as adequately as present conditions will permit. Therefore I take satisfaction in giving it every ounce of support I can.

This bill strikes hard at practices which have robbed countless investors of their savings. Interstate and foreign commerce is barred against new securities until registration statements have been on file with the Federal Trade Commission 30 days. At any time thereafter the Commission may issue a "stop" order for sufficient cause. Every prospectus, by radio or otherwise, must contain the essential parts of the statement. Appropriate penalties, both civil and criminal, are prescribed. Exemption is granted securities sold within 60 days after passage of the act, all public securities, ordinary banking transactions, securities of religious or similar nonprofit corporations, building-and-loan issues, common-carrier issues under the Interstate Commerce Commission, policies of licensed insurance companies, and so forth. Care is taken to preserve the full powers of the State securities commissions. Cases under the Federal act may be brought in the State courts, and no such case may be removed from a State court of competent jurisdiction to a United States court.

Apparently all those judicious friends of securities legislation who raised objections against certain portions of the earlier draft as possibly mischievous are satisfied with the bill before the House today.

So far, excellent. At the same time, it strikes me as the proper moment to give notice that some, or perhaps all, of us who have supported the present measure intend attacking financial rascality and financial secretiveness on a broader front whenever the abatement of public fear permits further reform.

This means that while just now we cannot safely deal with securities already before the public nor with corporate management in reference to the investor, there will be another story before very long.

Mr. Chairman, even in advance of this program there are some steps which we might take. I prepared a paragraph to offer as an amendment to the pending bill should the opportunity occur. It is adapted from the British Companies Act of 1929 and reads:

It shall be unlawful for any person to go from house to house offering securities for subscription or purchase to the public or any member of the public within the District of Columbia or any Territory with the exception of such securities as are exempted from the operation of this act: Provided, That the expression "house" shall not include an office used for business purposes and that the provisions of this subsection shall not apply where the offer was made only to persons with whom the person making the offer has been in the habit of doing regular business in the purchase or sale of securities.

Now, the restriction here to the District of Columbia and the Territories is made because I have been advised that Congress can probably go no further along the line proposed. But if so, there would be no reason why, besides benefit to the people of the District of Columbia and the Territories through Federal enactment, this form of protection should not be legislated in every State. I certainly hope that something of the sort will be done.

It is through house-to-house solicitation that the unwary, the unworldly, and the uninformed are chiefly defrauded. We are all familiar with the high-pressure security salesman, his elaborate technique of approach and of closing, his prepared harangue to outtalk the unprepared prospect, and his faked-up enthusiasm.

Such men, along with the more highly placed exponents of buccaneering finance whose agents they often are, act as deadly toxin-producing bacteria in the body politic. Unless checked, they will cause people to turn in despair from the evils of our American system, our so-called "capitalism", to communism or some other vain hope. At best we have enough problems on our hands, problems largely inflicted upon us by them and by affiliates of theirs as short-sighted if not as unscrupulous as themselves.

Especially must there be safeguards against men who are members of oligarchies holding their control over the public's investments simply by succession from within. We have witnessed a very recent case of one of these, a case the more outrageous in its greed because it occurred amid the grievous sufferings of our people.

Unfortunately the small, scattered stockholders and the public never become acquainted with such looting, or at least with its extent, unless some one wealthy stockholder brings suit, or the insiders fall out among themselves, or testimony is compelled by a congressional committee. So it was in the notorious case just mentioned, and so also in a $30,000,000-rake-off exposed sometime before.

Who ever heard of an instance where those in control of a large corporation and not opposed by another powerful group were unable to announce plenty of stockholders' proxies for anything they wanted done?

It is often the case, and better for the stockholders, that corporations under such control are actually run by capable and intelligent men at modest salaries while the insiders take all the credit along with huge graft.

These performances are paralleled in the same general class of corporation management by manipulating the stock unscrupulously, by unloading on the corporation holdings acquired at far lower figures, and by many others of the sort. Often the first hint outsiders get of a capital operation is when the insiders, having sold out under cover of false corporation reports, go short and profit further as the stock heads for zero or its neighborhood. Every little while some such news comes out in the newspapers concerning a so-called "security" listed on the New York Stock Exchange, and nothing is ever done about it.

I am glad to say that in the midst of all this roguery many of our large corporations, including some of the very largest, have beyond doubt been conducted honorably and capably. They do not conceal their condition by untrue, misleading, or inadequate statements. It is gratifying, too, that the New York Stock Exchange officials are seeking, though with much less power than good will, at least to compel the issue of better than farcical reports.

Good, bad, or indifferent, the managements of our big corporations deal with their security holders and the investing public practically as they see fit. In England the investor has been strongly protected by strictly administered law for several generations. I have studied with interest the comparatively recent proceedings under which a peer of the realm and owner of great wealth was given a year's penal sentence for a corporation report which would cause no criticism over here—the Lord Kylsant case.

Enough said of these aspects of the problem not now timely for legislative action. In the bill before the House we have, indeed, made a good start. While waiting for the next opportunity I want to do what I can to help throw the fear of God and of the American people into those public enemies who will continue beyond the effective reach of the law.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL].

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. The statement has been made that this is not a blue sky law; and insofar as its main purpose goes, it is not a blue sky law. To this extent I am in entire agreement with the purposes of the proposed legislation.

I doubt the advisability in any instance of a so-called "blue sky" law that implies the approval of the State or of the Government of securities listed under registration provisions. If we must have a blue sky law, it would be better if it were a national law so that but one registration and one approval of a security issued would be required.

In addition to the main purpose of requiring registration of security issues, the bill under consideration contains a provision that ties it up with every blue sky law of the various States. In this sense it is a blue sky law, or a bill that would result in a blue sky law. In my opinion, this feature of the bill is entirely vicious; and if the rule under which the bill is being considered permitted, I would move to amend by striking out section 18 dealing with this particular subject. In the original draft of the bill this was section 14. I appeared before the committee at the hearings in the effort to have it eliminated, and had hoped that the committee would cut out that particular provision.

It declined to do so, but did modify it in the bill as rewritten. This provision appears in the present bill as section 18. I understand that the provision in question has been omitted from the companion bill in the Senate, and I urge that it be eliminated in the conference between the two Houses.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks by including two letters I received dealing directly with section 14 of the original bill, which is section 18 of this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. The letters which I desire to incorporate in my remarks are from Mr. Leon Starmont, a representative of the Northwest Mining Association, of Spokane, Wash. The letters follow:

SPokane, Wash., April 12, 1933.

The Honorable SAMUEL B. HILL,

House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: This will acknowledge your letter of April 8. You may be assured that the entire mining industry of the Western States appreciates your efforts to remove section 14 from the Federal securities bill, and particularly your voluntary appearance before the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to present the objections which all those engaged in creating new businesses and industries must have toward this section when they understand its meaning.

Your aggressive interest will be brought to the attention of those in whose behalf you are acting.

A copy of the revised bill as rewritten by the Senate Banking Committee arrived in Spokane today. Section 14 has been slightly revised, but not enough to make it beneficial. It still tends to monopolize all financing in Wall Street by the provision that all new securities must have approval of the various State blue-sky commissions before they can be marketed in the several States.

The prohibition against advertising a security nationally until all States had qualified it has been removed in the Senate committee—but what's the use of advertising stocks or bonds which cannot be sold to a large proportion of those who may answer the advertising?

The Senate revision also exempts all securities already issued. This defeats the very purpose of the measure. It not only leaves the way open for fraudulent practices but extends an absolute invitation to fraud on the part of the financial underworld.

Let me explain that statement briefly: There are literally thousands of corporations now dormant whose shares are still in existence and which can be bought up for a few cents or fractions of a cent per share. The proposed Securities Act would make it almost impossible to raise money for new companies, but would enable individuals to buy these existing issues at a low price, create a little fictitious activity, and market the shares to the public at absolutely unlimited profits to themselves. Stocks purchased for 1 cent a share might be resold at $1 or $10 or $100, and there would be nothing in the Federal statutes or the State blue sky laws to prevent it. That is the manner in which most stock frauds are perpetrated. There are very few corporations whose shares are fraudulent at the time of the original issue. Most frauds occur in the resale of issued stocks at fictitious or inflated valuations.

Section 14 in the Senate revision retains the worst feature of the old Denison bill, which was defeated some years ago. Its effect will be to perpetuate monopolies for companies already existing and whose shares are now listed on the New York Stock Exchange or the other large eastern markets.

The reason for this may be found in the language of the various State blue sky laws, which will become practically sections of the Federal law if section 14 is retained. These laws generally cover only new stock issues, but they exempt from their provisions the new shares of companies whose old shares are listed in New York.

This makes the listing committee of the New York Stock Exchange a virtual part of the American Government.

It is understood to be the President's policy to move the seat of government away from Wall Street and back to Washington, but section 14 insinuates Wall Street into the Federal Government and effectively nullifies the benefits of the entire bill.

Thus a company—let us call it "American Flypaper"—whose stock is listed in New York can raise additional capital by merely meeting the publicity requirements of the Federal act. That automatically makes its issue salable anywhere in the United States.

But a rival concern—let us call it "National Flypaper"—whose stock is not listed in New York, will have to qualify under all the various blue sky laws at an estimated cost of $40,000 upward, with annoying and exasperating delays, and no guaranty that some obscure State commissioner for no sufficient reason may not refuse to grant a qualification in his particular State.

The New York Stock Exchange, in other words, can dictate which corporations may go to the public for additional capital and which may not.

I don't believe President Roosevelt intends any such thing. I don't believe any Congressman or Senator intends any such thing. But that is the effect of the bill.

Another objection to section 14 is that it will increase the cost of shares to the public. Companies which advertise their shares either in newspapers and periodicals or by direct-mail solicitation frequently raise money at a cost of 5 percent to 10 percent. Long experience has demonstrated that the use of salesmen brings the total financing cost from 30 percent to 60 percent, and that the roundabout method of having stocks underwritten and then listed on an exchange increases the cost of financing to approximately 70 percent—in extreme cases within my personal knowledge it has reached 99½ percent.

The buyer always pays the cost of financing, including the cost of qualifying under the blue sky laws. Section 14 practically compels the buyer to pay more for his stock, by shutting out those companies which have marketed their shares direct to the public, without commissions, and requiring all moneys to be handled by stock-exchange brokers or so-called "investment bankers."

It is strange indeed that most of the comment on the securities bill, including all the newspaper accounts that I have seen except those in the Wall Street Journal, ignore the hidden meaning of section 14. The Wall Street Journal account merely stresses the impossible provisions of the original bill, which would have shut off all financial advertising of new securities except those which are automatically exempt from the State laws. Apparently that publication is willing to have section 14 retained if its own advertising revenue is not threatened.

The absence of comment on section 14 must mean that its real meaning has so far escaped the understanding of Congressmen, correspondents, and independent financiers—meaning those not connected with Wall Street.

Should this bill slip through with the "joker" undetected, it is my prediction that section 14 in later years will be known as the "crime of 1933"—for it was in some similar manner, if my reading of history is correct, that the Congress 60 years ago was led to demonetize silver, now known as the "crime of 1873."

A great responsibility rests upon the few Members of the House and Senate who are able to discern the meaning of this proposal to turn all American financing over to Wall Street. If they can make the majority understand what section 14 means, they will save this country from a great catastrophe.

I hope you and your associates will be able to make this situation clear and prevent the enactment of legislation that will encourage fraud, penalize all investors, and make the New York Stock Exchange (a private club of rather unsavory reputation) an actual part of the Government of the United States.

Most sincerely,

LEON STARMONT.

SPOKANE, WASH., April 13, 1933.

The honorable SAMUEL B. HILL,

House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

DEAR JUDGE: I wrote you at some length yesterday discussing, among other things, the open invitation to fraud which the Federal securities bill presents by exempting stocks already issued.

In one of the newspapers publishing Paul Mallon's National Whirligig feature I note this sentence:

"The clause making old securities subject to Federal scrutiny will probably be eliminated. Wall Street kicked up too much fuss."

If you can get the Members from the West, South, and Middle West to understand that section 14 makes Wall Street the absolute dictator of national financing, you can kill this bill. Mallon is beginning to see the light. If the New York Stock Exchange can do as it pleases, of course, Wall Street is going to welcome this bill, while making some public pother about "accepting" its restrictions.

Nothing is restricted, as the bill now stands, except honest business. The stock crooks and racketeers can get away with murder. The financial underworld will reign supreme.

Sincerely,

LEON STARMONT.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. REILLY].

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Chairman, I shall vote for the pending bill, because I believe it to be a step in the right direction. Wisconsin, the State that I have the honor to represent in part on the floor of this House, had a blue sky law for many years. The fact of the matter is Wisconsin was one of the pioneer States in the Union to attempt by legislation to protect her citizens from being imposed upon through the sale of unsound and worthless securities.

There are two theories under which the National Government may operate in the matter of protecting the citizens of our country from being fleeced in the purchase of worthless securities. One is for the Federal Government to insist, as provided in this bill, that full information be given to the public regarding the soundness of the security offered for sale before the said securities are put on the market in interstate commerce.

The other theory is, and it is a theory that has been advocated on the floor of this House today, that the Government of the United States should go further and withhold a permit to sell securities in interstate commerce that in the judgment of the Government should not be sold, thereby indirectly putting the approval of the National Government on the soundness of the securities that are permitted to be sold in interstate commerce.

In my judgment, it would be a serious mistake for the Federal Trade Commission, the agency authorized in this bill, to carry out the terms of this law, to be required directly or indirectly to approve any stock or securities to be offered for sale in interstate commerce. The National Government will have gone the limit in this line of legislation when it makes available for its citizens full and complete information regarding the merits of the enterprise asking for the privilege of selling its stock to the people of the country.

The pending bill does not in any way interfere with the various States of the Union from writing such legislation as they may see fit to write to protect their citizens from being imposed upon by high-powered salesmen in the sale of worthless securities.

The fact of the matter is this bill will help the States to carry out their legislative program for protecting their citizens from being the purchasers of worthless or doubtful securities.

This bill does not in any way affect securities already issued, unless the issuing corporation should buy up her own securities and attempt to sell them again, in which case the latter sale would come under the terms of this law.

It is estimated that during the 10-year period prior to the breaking of the panic in the fall of 1929, $50,000,000,000 of securities were sold to the American people and that at least one half of the securities sold have turned out to be worthless.

This law is intended to prevent such sales in the future. It is too bad that this legislation was not written 10 years ago, at about the time the investment banker, the promoter, and the high-powered stock salesmen came into existence.

There can be no doubt that the mad stock-market rampage of 1927, 1928, and 1929 and the high-finance operations of the investment bankers accentuated to a great degree our present industrial depression.

I regret very much that there are not in this bill provisions for the control and regulation of the stock exchanges of this country by the Federal Government, and I hope that such legislation will be part of the legislative program of the present administration.

Before the coming of the investment banker and the promoter into the financial and industrial life of our country, when a corporation or a partnership saw fit to sell bonds or securities it added up the costs of its plant and equipment and some extra money for operating expenses and then sold to the public stocks or bonds to cover that total sum; but when the investment banker and the promoter got in action the cost of the plant cut no figure; the big idea was what kind of a showing could be made on paper as to the value of the plant based on the profits of the plant.

In other words, after the war our financial geniuses began their dizzy career of capitalizing profits and selling to the confiding American people bonds on estimated profits that might fade away.

These promoters would go to a business concern and coolly inform the owners that, from an inspection of their income-tax report, it would appear that their concern would stand a much greater capitalization. In other words, these promoters would inform the owners of a business that they could sell stock on their business representing a capitalization two or three times what the business was worth, the said capitalization to be based on the profits made the past year or so by the business.

These promoters would inform the owners of the enterprise proposed to be inflated that they might just as well sell their business and own it also the same as other institutions were doing.

In other words, they were told that they could sell 49 percent of the stock, get more money in cash, than the business was worth, and then continue to operate the business as representatives of themselves and the sucker stockholders, who bought stock based, not on real values but on profits made or estimated to be made in the future.

When people buy securities they should know whether or not they are paying for securities on the basis of the real value of the plant, or whether they are paying for the securities based upon illusive profits.

It is objected that this bill constitutes some more legislation that will interfere with business. Yes; the bill is intended to interfere with business—that is, a certain kind of undesirable business—that has fleeced the American investors out of billions of dollars in the past decade.

This bill will help to furnish the buying public information that it is hoped will enable them to know whether they are buying sound securities or putting their money in purely speculative or unsound investments. [Applause.]

Mr. PARKER of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from California [Mr. ELTSE].

Mr. ELTSE of California. Mr. Chairman, while I do not want to be understood as favoring section 18 of this bill, I do want to emphatically assert that I believe in the principle and purposes of the bill. Partisanship does not enter into my consideration of it.

I have steadfastly proclaimed that I stood squarely for Federal regulation to protect our investing public against loans made to foreign nations and borrowers by international bankers and brokers because they pegged the market until they could peddle their securities and then withdrew their support, resulting in withdrawal of untold millions of dollars from circulation and untold millions of losses to the American investors.

SOURCE OF FUNDS LOANED TO FOREIGN NATIONS

It is to be remembered that there are three classes of foreign loans:

First. Government loans; that is, government to government loans, limited to the so-called "war loans."

Second. Private credits; that is, credits extended by banks and banking houses out of funds in their control.

Third. Public loans; that is, advances by American banks and bankers to foreign governments and corporations, the funds being derived from the sale to American private investors of the bonds and stocks of the foreign governments and corporations.

It is with this last class of loans that we are here principally concerned.

That the Members of the House may know something of the vital importance to the American investor of H.R. 5480 as the same bears upon investments in foreign securities, I wish to give some statistics expressed in terms of dollars. The imagination can scarcely envelop or comprehend the enormity of the loans made to foreign governments—exclusive of war loans—and corporations. While these figures may not be entirely, they are at least fairly, accurate for the period 1914 to 1930.

It was through and by means of loans made by international bankers and brokers from funds derived from the sale of foreign securities to the American investor that the American investor was shorn and impoverished. He literally was a sheep led to the slaughter.

The American investor was relying upon the bankers, since faith in the bankers was virtually the only measuring rod for the investor. How certain bankers and brokers have breached that faith is part of this whole sordid story.

These international bankers and brokers have evinced great satisfaction and pride that scarcely any of the bonds remained in their hands when the crash came. Thus in December 1931 Thomas W. Lamont, partner of J. P. Morgan & Co., testified before the Senate Finance Committee that the terrific losses which had been suffered through depreciation of the value of foreign bonds had fallen on the investors rather than the banks; and in this connection it is interesting to note that his house had floated loans to 16 foreign governments and concerns totaling $1,705,398,000—this during the post-war period. What has been the investor's loss has been to the advantage of the exploiting bankers and brokers. They managed well in divesting themselves almost completely of the issues that they sponsored, thus saving themselves from participation in any of the losses. In the first instance, these bankers and brokers have solicited the confidence of the investing public in order to foist upon them these billions of dollars in securities and then, without any regard for moral duty to verify the soundness of the underlying security of the bonds, they have breached and violated that confidence and failed in every degree to measure up to the trust reposed in them by the investors. The only answer is that these bankers had in mind the fat commissions which they would receive on the sale of the securities, and in order to fatten the goose which they have unwittingly killed they sent solicitors and runners abroad in every corner of the earth to drum up applications for loans.

It is common knowledge that some of the outstanding citizens of Germany have complained that they were virtually implored by American bankers and brokers to accept loans. Of course that is no excuse for the debtors but at the same time it shows the inordinate and greedy desire of these bankers to get—I did not say earn—a fat commission.

This Government has stood supinely by and has shown little concern as to how the money which we loaned was spent, with the result that much of it was wasted in purchases to gratify temporary and passing wants. Millions were expended in noncommercial and unproductive improvements of little, if any, value to the borrowers. Other millions were spent in making improvements for commercial productive purposes which would come into direct competition with the industries and business of the United States.

I submit to you, ladies and gentlemen of the House, that it is high time that this Government set up a control and regulation of the distribution of domestic and foreign securities, as provided in this bill, to the end that the American investor may be protected against exploitation. [Applause.]

Mr. PARKER of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BEEDY].

Mr. BEEDY. Mr. Chairman, casual reference by one of the Members of the House was just made to a provision in what he termed "the original securities bill." This reference to the original bill suggests the propriety of comparing a provision or two of that bill with the pending measure. And this pending bill is quite properly being considered regardless of party lines. However, the various stages through which the pending proposal has passed, and in the time allotted I can make but brief reference to one or two of them, serve to illustrate the compromises and departures from original intentions which are very generally made in formulating legislative proposals, by whatever party is in power.

Many times during the last 12 years of my membership in this House I have listened passively to accusations from the Democratic side that the Republican Party legislates for the protection of property; that the Republican Party stands for property rights as opposed to human rights. This accusation is generally followed by the proud claim that "the Democratic Party puts human rights above property rights." Of course, the truth of the matter is that without a government of laws, obedience to which is duly observed, there would be neither human rights nor property rights. It is indeed difficult to conceive of any respectable Government under which both human and property rights are not zealously guarded and righteously valued, irrespective of party platforms.

The pending bill, we have been told, is a part of the administration program. Some Member on the Democratic side this afternoon made inquiry, doubtless to leave the implication that the Republican Party had failed to enact similar legislation at an earlier date, "Why such a law had not been passed years ago." The gentleman from New York [Mr. PARKER] made a very proper reply. The fact is, that the rapid succession of events brings changed conditions; abuses of one period suggest one remedy, while abuses of another period suggest yet other remedies, and the culmination of abuses in the sale of securities during the last few years has made this particular legislation advisable, if not imperative.

Unquestionably, legislation seeking to curb abuses in the marketing of securities would be a most natural, if not an inevitable, part of the program of whatever party found itself entrusted with power. It is, therefore, conceded without question that the purpose for which this bill is written is highly laudable.

In the first place, the bill aims to bring the fullest light of publicity upon the proposed issue and sale of securities in general. All this is as it should be, but unquestionably the real meat of this proposed legislation is to be found in the sections which provide a remedy for the purchasing public against those who should properly be made responsible for unconscionable practices in the marketing of securities. The real test of the efficacy of this legislative proposal is to be determined by the relentless vigor with which it proposes that the defrauded purchaser may pursue properly responsible parties.

Let us now proceed to compare briefly what may be nominated the liability features of the original bill, which was introduced by the Chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce [Mr. RAYBURN] on the 29th day of last March, with the liability features of the bill which he introduced on May 4 and which is now before us for passage on this 5th day of May. The changes made in the last bill as against the former serve to illustrate that however bold a start may be made by any political party newly entrusted with power there is sure to be a yielding to the demands of those who are primarily concerned with the protection of property rights.

If you will turn to page 6, section 4, of the original bill of March 29, you will find that its provisions called for the filing of—

A registration statement signed by the issuer or issuers, its or their principal executive officer or officers, the principal financial officer or advisors, and the directors, trustees, or managers.

Note that this original bill required the registration statement to be signed by all the directors and not by a part of them. This is conceded to be the correct interpretation of the phrase "and the directors."

The March 29 bill further provided on page 19, section 9, that—

In case any such statement shall be false in any material respect, any persons acquiring any securities to which such statement relates, either from the original issuer or from any other person, shall have the right to rescind the transaction and to obtain the return, either at law or in equity, of any and all consideration given or paid for any such securities upon the surrender thereof either from any vendor knowing of such falsity or from the persons signing such statement jointly or severally.

You will note that this first proposal of the administration for the regulation of the sale of securities and the protection of the public against unconscionable practices in the marketing of the same afforded a plain and unconditional remedy. The purchaser aggrieved could go into a court of law or equity and seek recovery from any one of the persons signing the registration statement. And you will remember that every director, as a matter of law (had the administration pressed the bill of March 29 for enactment into law) would have been compelled to sign the registration statement. No director could escape the signing of the registration statement, and therefore no director could have escaped liability for any representation contained in the registration statement which proved to be "false in any material respect."

Now, what has happened since this bold declaration of rights and proposed remedies was made in the original securities bill sponsored by the present administration? The party in power has been duly impressed with its responsibility for the protection of property rights. Representatives of big business with large property holdings undoubtedly have contacted the leaders in the present administration. They have represented most forcefully that to attempt to hold boards of directors to any such strict rule of accountability would work a hardship upon legitimate industry; that to boast of placing human rights above property rights sounds well in a political campaign, but that as a matter of fact unless property rights are duly protected, human rights themselves will be unduly prejudiced. Apparently the administration has listened to the representatives of big business. Accordingly we find a marked change from the original bill in those sections of the pending bill, introduced on May 4, which provide just who shall sign the registration statement and just what degree of liability may be imposed upon these signers by the aggrieved purchasers of securities.

The pending bill, on page 11, section 6, provides that the registration statement—

Shall be signed by the issuer or issuers, its principal executive officers, its principal financial officers, its controller, or principal accounting officers, and the majority of its board of directors or persons performing similar functions.

Bear in mind that this provision is important because when the pending bill later outlines the remedy for any person acquiring securities, it is expressly stated that such persons may sue "every person who signed the registration statement." Observe that in the original bill all the directors must sign the statement, while in the pending bill only a majority of the directors shall sign or—please observe this also—the directors may be relieved from signing if a majority of "persons performing similar functions" sign.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maine has expired.

Mr. PARKER of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 minutes more.

Mr. BEEDY. You will note that in this section of the new bill—and I am now talking of the real vitals of this legislation—the door of escape from liability by directors is left wide open.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEEDY. I will, if the gentleman has some time to give me which will enable me to complete my statement.

Mr. RAYBURN. I just wanted to correct the gentleman.

Mr. BEEDY. If the gentleman feels when I have finished my statement that I have not made a correct explanation, I will gladly yield.

The remedy sections in the pending bill are to be found on page 20. Here is the provision in lines 21 and 22 that suit may be brought against "every person who signed the registration statement." In the original bill this would have guaranteed a right of action against every member of the board of directors. In the pending bill a right of action is given against the majority of the board of directors or against a majority of such persons as perform duties similar to the duties of a board of directors.

Under the provision of the new bill other persons also may be sued, but if you will study the provisions of the bill, beginning on page 21, line 14, and continuing to page 24, line 5, you will see that all persons who may be sued under the provisions of the bill can escape liability if they prove, although there was an "untrue statement of a material fact" or omission "to state a material fact", that they "after reasonable investigation" had "reasonable ground to believe and did believe" and irrespective of whether the statements in the registration statement were made by experts or others, they in fact "did believe at the time such registration statement became effective that the statements therein were true and that there was no omission to state a material fact", and so forth.

I call your attention to these radical departures in the pending bill from those provisions in the original bill which provided a remedy for the investing public in securities to emphasize the fact that the public itself because of the provisions in this bill may not look for any easy recovery of funds from persons of whom they have purchased securities. As for myself, I believe that in practice the investing public has fully as adequate a remedy under existing law as is given by any of the provisions of the pending bill. It is fair to say in concluding our discussion of this feature of the bill that the party in power has herein seen fit to afford ample protection to those extensive moneyed interests having to do with the issuance and sale of securities.

There is just one other provision of the pending bill to which I would call your attention. It is to be found at the top of page 20 and reads as follows:

The statements or information required to be included in a prospectus by or under authority of subsection (a) or (b) when written shall be placed in a conspicuous part of the prospectus in type as large as that used generally in the body of the prospectus.

This is a very wise provision. It would compel those who as initial to the sale of securities are publishing their prospectuses to print essential information contained in such prospectuses in sizable type, and not print in some inconspicuous space and in small type statements equally material. Clearly, the provision aims to make concealment of material facts difficult. It aims to make prospectuses honest and in no sense misleading or calculated to deceive. It sets up a standard of business morality in this country for men engaged in the private business of issuing and selling securities. I commend it. I endorse it.

I now call your attention to a $5 Federal Reserve bank note which I hold in my hand. It is a sample of one kind of emergency currency, so called, which the present administration has authorized to be issued. It is a kind of currency which I have contended it was unnecessary to issue.

At the top of this bill, in large capital type, I read first the words "National Currency." Just under these words and still in large capital type, I read the words "Secured by United States bonds deposited with the Treasurer of", and then, in larger capital type, are to be found the words "The United States of America." Now, the casual reader would stop there. But if he will examine this currency closer (and mark you this is not a Federal Reserve note, but a Federal Reserve bank note, an emergency piece of currency issued as an incident of the present administration program), and if his eyesight is good, he may read the words in rather fine print "or by like deposit of other securities."

The point I make is that the manner in which, under the direction of the present Secretary of the Treasury, this particular kind of national currency is being engraved and issued violates that standard of business morality which the pending bill would establish for the private business man. Words in large type engraved on the top of the bill are calculated to induce the holder of this currency to believe that it is secured by United States bonds in the custody of the Treasurer of the United States. The holder naturally loses sight of the most important piece of information which should be brought to his attention "in type as large as that used generally in the body of the $5 bill", namely, that this kind of currency is not necessarily secured by United States bonds but by "other securities."

These "other securities" are not fit basis for the issuance of good money, I contend. And this style of engraving is an implied confession of error on the part of those who ever advocated the issuance of any such currency. It clearly makes it easy for the public to be misled and deceived as to the real security behind the currency. But the public is entitled to accurate and specific information in this regard.

I commend to the Secretary of the Treasury the same standard of business morality in the printing of the administration's fiat currency as you now seek to set up for the average business man who is issuing prospectuses for the sale of securities.

I submit that the Secretary of the Treasury should observe the same principles of business morality in the public engraving of this fiat money as that which is to be imposed upon private business. I submit that he should set forth the facts touching the security behind this money not partly in large capital type and partly in small type, but that he should set out the essential truths on the face of the currency in equally conspicuous type. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maine has again expired.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BLACK].

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, every State in the Union has one or more laws against larceny. The Federal Government has a law against larceny through the mails. Here is another law on a grand scale against larceny. I hope it does more good than the laws of the 48 States and the present laws of the Union.

Why do we need this law? We need this law because of the nonenforcement of all the present statutes all over this country against larceny. Why are they not enforced? What has brought this situation to the attention of the people? Those laws have not been enforced because of the imposing names and impressive titles of the present-day big crooks.

Our President was Governor of the State of New York for 4 years while a great number of these crimes which are talked about on this floor were committed. He probably now realizes that the States do not have adequate force to meet the situation, so he suggests this bill, and he is behind it.

There is a Federal law that has been on the books that could have taken care of anybody who has been charged before the Senate committee or generally in the public press, with having swindled the public, but that law has not been enforced. Why? Again, because of the imposing names of the men who violated those laws.

Mr. MOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. No; I do not have time.

I think we are doing the usual thing when we do not want to enforce laws. We pass another one. I say it will do the country more good and restore the confidence of the people quicker than any statute if this Congress would appropriate a large sum of money to organize a flying squad for the prosecution of every case under the mail-fraud section where the amounts involved are large. Let the Attorney General get a special crew of lawyers; let the Post Office Department assign to them a special crew of post-office inspectors and take the information they get from the Senate committee and go out and indict and convict them. We will not need this law to restore confidence. There have been plenty of violations of the mail-fraud section already evidenced before the Senate committee. The men who have done those things are men of high-sounding names.

They are men responsible for the crash. I said from the beginning you would not restore confidence in the banks, you would not restore prosperity in this country, until the men who have been leading the financial situation of the country, who have been involved in violations of law, are convicted of crimes. You will not convict them by passing new laws. Let the Attorney General be directed to enforce all the present laws and not take up the time of Congress in passing a new law as is usually done when they do not want to enforce the laws on the statute books. Take some of the big bankers from behind the bank cages and put them in others.

I have little patience with the men from the West and the South who are always finding fault with New York in connection with stock operations. The New York Stock Exchange has served a very important function in the development of this country, because it has been the channel through which the West and the South and the undeveloped portions of the country got the money for their development. They sold their securities in the East through the medium of the stock exchange.

The stock exchange has provided a market for those who had securities on hand that were listed to sell them, but the banks with affiliated securities companies did not provide any market for those who held their securities. You took them and kept them when they were no good. If in the course of the operation of the stock exchange there has been fraud in the prospectuses of corporations or in their financial statements, that fraud was not committed by members of the stock exchange or by the brokers. That fraud was committed by the business man, by the banker, by the industrialist, by the utilities man who went to the stock exchange and made the misstatement. And he does not come from New York. The wildcat oil operator, the wildcat mine operator who took a New York address in order to swindle the men in the East, are among the men who gave false statements.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BLACK] has expired.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the committee amendments be read.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. ARNOLD). If there is no further debate, the Clerk will report the first committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 6, line 15, after the word "States", strike out the words "or any political subdivision thereof" and insert "or by any political subdivision of a State or Territory, or by any public instrumentality of one or more States or Territories exercising an essential governmental function."

Mr. RAYBURN. I will state for the information of the committee that that is simply a clarifying amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Second committee amendment: On page 6, line 23, after the word "bank", insert the words "or by any banking institution organized under the laws of any State or Territory, the business of which is substantially confined to banking and is supervised by the State or Territorial banking commission or similar official."

Mr. RAYBURN. This amendment, Mr. Chairman, simply places State banks and their issues on the same ground as Federal banks or national banks.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 8, line 19, after the word "underwriter", insert the words "and not involving any public offering."

Mr. RAYBURN. This simply clarifies the language, I may say, Mr. Chairman.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KENNEY. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I shall presently ask unanimous consent to offer. I realize that under the established rules of the House this may not be done, but I understand there is no objection from the committee.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. ARNOLD). The House has adopted a rule limiting amendments to committee amendments. The Committee of the Whole cannot change the rule adopted by the House, even by unanimous consent.

Mr. KENNEY. I realize that. I shall offer the amendment after the Committee rises.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the Committee rises.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. ARNOLD, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that the committee having had under consideration the bill (H.R. 5480) to provide full and fair disclosure of the character of securities sold in interstate and foreign commerce and through the mails, and to prevent frauds in the sale thereof, and for other purposes, pursuant to House Resolution 130, he reported the bill back to the House with sundry amendments adopted by the committee.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule the previous question is ordered.

Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

Mr. KENNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to offer an amendment, which I have sent to the desk and ask the Clerk to read. I understand there is no objection from the committee.

The SPEAKER. The previous question has been ordered. The amendment is not in order.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Does the fact the previous question has been ordered foreclose the offering of an amendment?

The SPEAKER. Yes. That is the object of ordering the previous question.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Has it been ordered?

The SPEAKER. Yes; the previous question is ordered by the rule.

Mr. KENNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my amendment be read for information and printed in the Record.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will report the amendment for the information of the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. KENNEY: On page 9, line 13, after the word "own", insert the words "employees or."

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them en gros.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. RAYBURN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

RESIGNATION FROM COMMITTEE

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following communication:

HON. HENRY T. RAINEY,

Speaker House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

FARM RELIEF

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the conferees may have until midnight tonight to file conference report on the bill H.R. 3835, the farm relief bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT OVER

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet at 12 o'clock noon on Monday next.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

AMENDMENT OF THE INTERSTATE COMMERCE ACT

Mr. FORD. Mr. Speaker, today I introduced a bill to amend paragraph 8, section 1, of the Interstate Commerce Act. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on that bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oregon?

There was no objection.

Mr. FORD. Mr. Speaker, no man today would have the temerity to advocate a return to the scandals of railroad rebating. Everybody with the least knowledge of railroad regulation is familiar with the oil-rebate scandals, by which major oil interests stifled competition because they could ship oil at lower rates than their competitors. By getting lower railroad rates they could sell oil at lower prices. The railroad rate practically fixed the price of oil.

We are all equally familiar with the railroad coal scandals. In those cases the railroads, by ownership of coal companies and by preferential shipping services, could stifle competition from independent coal operators. We all remember what the Government did about that. It said to the railroads: "You can't own coal mines. If you are in the business of transporting coal, you must get rid of your mines." This mandate was enforced.

Today railroad rebating and common ownership of mines and railroads are as out-of-date as stagecoaches. Anyone suggesting a return to that railroad era would be howled out of any society of decent-thinking people. Nevertheless, we have today in one of our greatest industries a situation which in many respects is infinitely worse. I refer to the ownership of oil pipe lines by producing and refining companies and to the present practices indulged in under such joint ownership.

The pipe line has taken the place of the railroad in the old picture so far as transportation of oil is concerned. And it has far outdistanced its predecessor which moved on rails. In fact, it has made the ancient practices of the railroad in the rebate era look like the bungling efforts of the rankest amateurs.

The pipe line is the very heart of the oil monopoly. And it operates with utter simplicity. This is how it works: A major oil company is heavily interested in a large producing field and owns the pipe line running out of that field to market. It has a practical monopoly on the transportation of oil from that field through ownership of that pipe line, because railroads and trucks cannot compete with it. It fixes a price which it will pay for oil in the field. It can make that price as high or as low as it desires. Then it fixes a price which it will charge for transportation. In practice it fixes a price paid the producer at the intake which is so low that it starves him and gives the pipe-line company the bulk of the difference between his price and the current market price at which the oil is sold at the other end.

No matter what the market price, the independent producer has nothing to say about what he will receive. He must take whatever the pipe line offers at the intake. And I do not hesitate to charge that that price is inordinately low nor that the transportation charge is so inordinately high that the pipe lines make exorbitant profits at the expense of the independent producer. The old Standard Oil, in its palmiest days of railroad rebates, never had such a cinch—such a copper-riveted, air-tight stranglehold on competition—and all perfectly legal.

In support of my charge that prices paid producers are outrageously low and that profits of pipe-line companies are outrageously high, I desire to quote the following figures of pipe-line earnings taken from official reports. Here they are:

Pipe-line company	Barrels of crude oil transported	Net income as reported	Dividends declared for 1930
A.....	172,385,186	$18,816,057	Percent 40
B.....	97,734,137	10,536,479	46
C.....	77,016,459	10,346,992	338
D.....	30,224,892	3,435,396	400
E.....	42,689,125	9,626,402	93.4
F.....	15,294,741	1,099,061	100

The foregoing earnings accrued to the parent corporation through ownership of the pipe-line company's stock.

On a per-barrel basis of net earnings we have:

	Net profit per barrel	Cents
A.....		11
B.....		11
C.....		13
D.....		11
E.....		22
F.....		7

An average for the whole of 12 cents.

You may say, "Ah, but that was 1930! What are they doing today?" In reply, I am very glad to quote the very latest earnings reports for the year ending December 31, 1932. Here they are:

Pipe-line company	Barrels transported	Net income	Dividend appropriations
A.....	160,559,350	$16,193,892.00	Percent 47
B.....	76,904,324	9,483,726.70	40
C.....	9,282,508	3,444,011.49	23
D.....	30,032,553	2,328,726.62	400
E.....	45,517,923	7,092,701.23	14
F.....	10,345,634	637,428.62	10

Here is another illuminating table, which tells the story conclusively. In this case the pipe-line company paid the producer but 10 cents per barrel. The oil was sold at a base price of 85 cents per barrel, but the difference of 75 cents was all taken over for transportation and handling. Note these figures:

	Cents
Posted price for oil, July 10, 1931 (producer).....	10
Gathering charge, Humble Tariff No. 43 (pipe line, parent corporation).....	12 1/4
Trunk-line charge to tidewater (pipe line, parent corporation).....	40
Ship-loading charge (pipe line, parent corporation).....	2 1/2
Total at tidewater pumped aboard ship.....	65
Service charge, or premium (parent corporation).....	20
Base price on tidewater.....	85

In the old days of railroad rebates the railroads practically dominated every form of business dependent upon transportation—sawmills, grain elevators, cotton compresses, warehouses. Such industries could not be operated by independents in competition with railroad-owned businesses. The rail carrier dominated through control over rates and facilities and by rebating to its allied companies. That has all been stopped by Federal law, but the pipe line, a much more potent and evil instrument in crushing competition and fostering monopoly, flourishes and reaps millions of unjust profits under legal operation. This practice, too, should be abolished and can be abolished by enactment of a very simple measure, which would merely prohibit interstate shipment of oil through any pipe line owned or controlled by any producing or refining company.

At the present time the claim is made that the oil industry is in a disorganized condition and that an emergency exists, and to prove this claim figures are cited to show the low price paid to producers for crude oil. Nevertheless the price to the consumer of gasoline is not low. The blame lies in the usurious charges of the pipe-line companies. The situation could be remedied almost overnight if the rates of the pipe-line companies were reduced and the exorbitant profits now being earned by the major oil companies through their control of the pipe-line companies could be transferred into higher prices paid for crude oil. This is one of the real remedies for the present oil situation.

FLORIDA NATIONAL GUARD

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for one-half minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREEN. I have asked this permission in order to insert in the RECORD at this point a resolution of the State Legislature of Florida regarding preparedness.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, the following House concurrent resolution, no. 8, of the Florida Legislature earnestly urges that our national defense be not impaired. In this substance I heartily concur and urge the cooperation of my colleagues to the end that we provide for adequate national defense. I regret not having time now for further discussion, but the resolution speaks for itself, and is as follows:

House Concurrent Resolution 8

Whereas it has unofficially come to the attention of this legislature that it is proposed by Executive order under the recent economy bill passed by the United States Congress to discontinue the annual field-training period for the Florida National Guard, at least during 1933, and reduce the armory drills by at least half the number now authorized, and also to dispense with a large number of Regular Army officer personnel and eliminate the Officers' Reserve Corps and the citizens' military training camps, in fact, if not on paper, by so crippling the ability of same to function that the morale of same will be impaired to the destruction of efficiency; and

Whereas the Legislature of the State of Florida believes that the maintenance of an adequate national defense has one of the first claims on government, being one of the five purposes recited in the preamble to the United States Constitution as the reason for agreeing to that document, and is opposed to any of the proposed measures contemplating the elimination of the field training for the National Guard, either temporarily or permanently, as well as to the reduction to any degree, temporarily or permanently, of the number of authorized drills for the National Guard, and believes that the present officer personnel of the Regular Army is needed to properly train the National Guard, Reserve Officers' Training Corps, citizens' military training camps, and Officers' Reserve Corps, as well as function as instructors in our schools, and is of the opinion that the citizens' military training camps serve not only as a means for training the young men but is a relief against unemployment as well for the period covered by such camps each year: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the house of representatives (the senate concurring), That the Legislature of the State of Florida most earnestly protests against any of the actions contemplated against our system of national defense, as recited in this resolution, and directs that the secretary of state forthwith forward by air mail, under the great seal of the State of Florida, a copy of this resolution to our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

Approved by the Governor of Florida May 2, 1933.

STATE OF FLORIDA,

Office Secretary of State, ss:

I, R. A. Gray, secretary of state of the State of Florida, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a true and correct copy of House Concurrent Resolution No. 8, passed by the Legislature of Florida, session 1933, and filed in this office.

Given under my hand and the great seal of the State of Florida at Tallahassee, the capital, this the 3d day of May A.D. 1933.

R. A. GRAY, Secretary of State.

MUSCLE SHOALS

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's desk the bill H.R. 5081, the Muscle Shoals bill, with Senate amendments, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, for my own information and for the information of the House, I should like to know what the effect will be of disagreeing to the Senate amendments? Will it be an expression of this House to the effect we are against the Norris bill and in favor of the bill passed by the House?

The SPEAKER. It gives an opportunity on the part of the conferees to agree on the differences between the two Houses.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. Will we not have the right to instruct the conferees before that matter is gone into?

If we disagree to the Senate amendments, does that waive our right to instruct the conferees to accept the Norris bill?

The SPEAKER. After the request is granted and before the conferees are appointed, it would be in order to move to instruct the conferees.

Is there objection?

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky and Mr. CARPENTER of Nebraska objected.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 3 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, a few days ago on the floor of the House I called attention to the resolution that is now pending before the Rules Committee proposing an audit of the Treasury Department. At that time it was intimated by an interrogation to me that I have not submitted sufficient evidence to warrant an investigation. I have furnished to the Rules Committee positive evidence, which was printed in the hearings of that committee, which justify this audit. However, I desire now to submit additional reasons for this audit. I shall read a copy of a letter transmitted to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue on April 14, 1933, by David A. Olson in connection with a specific tax evasion on the part of Andrew W. Mellon while he was Secretary of the Treasury:

WASHINGTON, D.C., April 14, 1933.

HON. DAVID BURNET,

Commissioner of Internal Revenue, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR COMMISSIONER:

Andrew W. Mellon

In the latter part of 1931 Mr. Mellon sold 60,000 shares of stock of Western Public Service Co. showing a loss of $1,000,000 and 123,000 shares of stock of Pittsburgh Coal Co. showing a loss of $5,700,000, or a total loss for that year of approximately $6,700,000, which loss was deducted for income-tax purposes.

The stock was sold through the Union Trust Co., Pittsburgh, Pa., and repurchased in 1932, 31 days after the presumed sale. The stock of the Pittsburgh Coal Co. was repurchased by the Coalesced Co., which is owned 100 percent by Mr. Mellon and his family.

These two companies were under the control of Mr. Mellon and his associates. Under the circumstances, were these transactions bona fide? Under the income tax law they were not.

Accordingly, in my opinion, the loss deducted on the income-tax returns is not a proper deduction. A detailed examination by your office will unquestionably reveal that the transactions were not bona fide sales, and that the deductions were illegal. These transactions appear to have accomplished the fraudulent withholding of income taxes from the Government.

I am taking the liberty to write to you about it because I believe it is in the interest of the public that any information of this kind should be disclosed to your office, realizing that the revenue agents sometimes fail to verify in detail all security transactions, and it is possible that your agent presumed this to be a valid sale.

I am anxiously waiting to hear from you as to your findings.
Sincerely yours,

DAVID A. OLSON.

I also wish to read a copy of the acknowledgment of this letter from David Burnet, Commissioner of Internal Revenue, under date of April 19, 1933, as follows:

In re A. W. Mellon.

APRIL 19, 1933.

Mr. DAVID A. OLSON,
Washington, D.C. (Parkside Hotel).

DEAR SIR: I have your letter of April 14, 1933, with respect to the 1931 income-tax return of the above-named taxpayer.

You may be sure that the matter will be very carefully investigated.

Very truly yours,

DAVID BURNET, Commissioner.

I should like to point out that the circumstances recited in this letter are similar to the admission of Mr. Charles E. Mitchell, former chairman of the board of the National City Bank, before the Senate Banking and Currency Committee, which admission caused his immediate indictment. In the case recited by Mr. Olson the offense is made more serious by the fact that Mr. Mellon, as Secretary of the Treasury at the time of these transactions, was in a position where he could pass upon the integrity of his own tax return through his subordinate, Mr. David Burnet, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

Mr. Olson informs me that he has had 18 months' experience in trying to secure action from Mr. Mellon, Mr. Mills, and Mr. Burnet on similar matters without any result whatever.

I insist that this House should take action on my resolution to cause an immediate, thorough, and exhaustive examination of the United States Treasury. This resolution is now pending before the Rules Committee.

In addition, I am sending to the Attorney General today a copy of Mr. Olson's letter to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and the Commissioner's reply, which is almost a month old at this time. [Applause.]

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may have until midnight tonight to file a conference report on the bill H.R. 4606, the $500,000,000 relief bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

H.CON.RES. 17

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 3 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I arise at this time to call the attention of the Members of Congress and the country to a resolution I have introduced known as "House Concurrent Resolution 17", proposing to raise the maximum age limit to permit war veterans to be included in the benefits of the act for the relief of unemployment through the President's program of reforestation.

Mr. MAPES. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Yes; I shall be pleased to yield to my good friend, the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. MAPES. The legislation which was passed authorizing the reforestation camps made no reference to the age of the persons who were to be taken into the camps, did it?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. That is true; but under the rules and regulations promulgated by those in charge of administering this act every former service man in the United States is excluded from the benefits because he is past the maximum age limit of 25 years.

My Concurrent Resolution 17 proposes to raise the age limit to give preferential employment in supervisory and administrative capacities to honorably discharged war veterans who are physically and mentally qualified for a position in the new forest camps. I have also proposed to give special consideration to those disabled veterans whose disability benefits will be stopped or substantially reduced under the provisions of the so-called "Economy Act", as well as those veterans who have dependents.

Mr. MAPES. Has the gentleman submitted his proposition to the administration?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I have; yes.

Mr. MAPES. The administration has complete power in the matter, has it not?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Yes; and yet it is not an unusual procedure for this Congress to express its opinion on administrative matters of so vital importance to the Nation.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I yield with pleasure to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Does the gentleman make it applicable to married men as well as single men?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Yes; and especially those who have dependents as well as those veterans whose disability compensation will be cut off under the Economy Act.

Mr. SNELL. Can the gentleman tell us how many are in these camps at the present time?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I could not give the gentleman the exact figures at this time.

Mr. GOSS. If the gentleman will permit, the gentleman will recall that the Chief of Staff of the Army appeared before the Military Affairs Committee the other day and stated there were 25,000 in the camps at that time with another contingent of 35,000 on the way.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I believe that is approximately correct.

Mr. KELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. KELLER. Is there any reason or justification for any age limit being set for Government service, unless and until the Government stands ready to pension a man because he has grown old?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Answering my friend from Illinois, I will say that the rank and file of our war veterans do not want a pension merely because some of them are beginning to grow old; but they do feel that they are entitled to earn any salary for which they may be able to qualify, payable by the Government they fought to defend. They resent being discriminated against, as is now being done, in administering this act.

Following is the resolution in question:

Whereas the regulations prescribed in the administration of the act for the relief of unemployment through a program of reforestation have fixed such a maximum age limit that war-service veterans are excluded from the benefits of such legislation; and

Whereas veterans who served in the military or naval forces of the United States during war have had valuable experience and training that has fitted many of them especially in training men and in carrying on public work involving hand labor; and

Whereas large numbers of such veterans are now, and have been, unemployed for long periods; and

Whereas disabled veterans in large numbers will be cut off from veterans' benefits by the operation of the Economy Act of March 20, 1933: Therefore be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That it is the sense of the Congress that the President, in the administration of the act entitled "An act for the relief of unemployment through the performance of useful public work, and for other purposes", approved March 31, 1933, shall make immediate provision for preferential employment in supervisory and administrative capacities of such honorably discharged war veterans who are physically and mentally qualified for such positions; and that such preference be given in the following order:

(1) To veterans who are disabled and whose benefits will be stopped or substantially reduced under the provisions of the aforesaid act;

(2) To veterans who are now unemployed and have dependents; and

(3) To those not coming within the above two classes.

A while ago I mentioned the Economy Act in answer to a question propounded by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES]. Let me say in this connection that when the President's Economy Act was passed by this House some weeks ago Members of Congress were given no opportunity to offer amendments and debate was very limited. No one seemed to know exactly what the provisions of the bill meant or what the effect would be on our disabled veterans, but we were assured that the bill would be administered fairly, justly, and humanely. Those of us in this House who were reluctant to support the bill in its original form and insisted upon the proposed Browning amendment that would limit slashing veterans' benefits to 25 percent were assured over and over again that our disabled buddies were in safe hands. We were reminded that a former Member of this House, who himself is a veteran with a distinguished war record, had just been appointed Director of the Budget. We were told that in his hands would largely fall the duty of administering the act and that the helpless and disabled war veterans who gave not only their jobs but their health to their Government when the dark clouds of war hung heavy over this land, would be dealt with fairly and humanely.

We were urged by our national commander of the American Legion, Hon. Louis Johnson, to support the so-called "Economy Act" in spite of its harsh and questionable provisions relating to veterans' benefits.

May I call your attention to a speech made yesterday at Indianapolis by the same national commander of the Legion in which he assails what he terms "frenzied application of the economy knife" in cutting veterans' benefits by Director Douglas, who was pledged to deal fairly and humanely with veterans. Again he charged that Douglas and Hines have gone far beyond what leaders in Congress had said would be the extreme limit of the burden to be imposed on veterans.

Mr. Speaker, I think I am voicing the sentiment of not only the ex-service men throughout the Nation but of all patriotic citizens of all creeds and political faiths when I say that the country will hold to account this Congress and those responsible for this legislation and for administering same if the men who bore the brunt of the World War as well as Spanish War veterans are automatically cut off and treated inhumanely and unsympathetically, as Director of the Budget Douglas and General Hines seem determined to do.

Now, to add insult to injury, every veteran in the United States has been barred from being employed in the reforestation army, regardless of the fact that he rendered a real heroic service to his Government when this country was in great peril.

Let me say here that the veterans of my State are just as patriotic in their efforts to help banish the depression and promote economic recovery as they were to assist in banishing a foreign foe during the years of 1917 and 1918. Practically every American Legion post in the district I have the honor to represent in Oklahoma has passed a resolution endorsing the President's program and pledging its loyal support to every reasonable effort of this administration to balance the Budget and reduce governmental expenses.

I have supported the President's program in the main from the beginning; but I say to you that it is unfair, it is unpatriotic, it is un-American for this Government to cut off all benefits to thousands of worthy, disabled war veterans and at the same time say to them they are incapable of rendering service to the Government in these reforestation camps because of their physical disabilities.

News dispatches state that another bonus march is in the making and that thousands of unemployed veterans will soon march on the National Capital demanding that their bonus be paid in cash. As one Member of this House who has consistently supported the bonus, not only because it is a debt the Government has acknowledged that is due the veterans, but because I feel it is a sound and practical method of really expanding the currency in every town, hamlet, and community in this land, I am hopeful there will be no more bonus marches on Washington. I have advised all veterans who have written me about the matter not to come. I have told them that by so doing they were hurting their cause, and I know other Members of this House have advised the former soldiers not to come to the National Capital at this time. But for the Government to promulgate rules that will bar every veteran in the United States from being employed in the reforestation camps will not be an incentive to prevent a bonus march on Washington.

Let me say in conclusion that this resolution has been sent to the Labor Committee, and knowing that fair, impartial, and intelligent consideration will be accorded by Chairman Connery and his committee, I am hopeful of securing favorable action very shortly. The gentleman from Michigan inquired a while ago if I had submitted my proposition to the administration, and I assured him that I had done so. I have taken this important proposal up with the White House, our distinguished Speaker, our able floor leader, and others in authority, and I am hopeful that something will be done within the next few days to modify the rules and raise the age limits of these Army camps so the needy veterans throughout the country may be given an opportunity to earn an honest but meager livelihood.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, which was ordered to lie on the table:

STATE OF WISCONSIN.

Joint resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States to support President Roosevelt's program relating to Muscle Shoals and in all his other recommendations

Whereas, in keeping with his pre-election promise to the American people, President Roosevelt is actively sponsoring legislation pertaining to power production, flood control, reforestation, farm and unemployment relief, securities regulation, economy in government, strengthening of the banking system, refinancing of farmers and home owners, and various other measures intended to end the depression; and

Whereas the carrying out of such a program will have an immediate economic value in furnishing employment to hundreds of thousands of unemployed and will give to the Government the opportunity to determine the fair charge for electric power which is now furnished by private power companies; and

Whereas as a first step in bringing back to the people the benefits of our natural resources there has been introduced in the United States Senate what is known as the "Norris Muscle Shoals Government operation bill", which, if it becomes a law, will permit the Federal Government to develop a large power plant in the Tennessee River Valley, make the Tennessee River commercially navigable the year round, and put through a reforestation program in order to safeguard the watershed; and

Whereas the Muscle Shoals project is but the first of a series of giant projects of the same kind to include the Columbia River Basin, the Ohio, Arkansas, and Missouri River Valleys: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the senate (the assembly concurring), That the Legislature of Wisconsin hereby respectfully memorializes the Congress of the United States to pass the Norris bill and to accord to President Roosevelt whole-hearted support in his entire program for ending the depression, as outlined in his several messages; be it further

Resolved, That properly attested copies of this resolution be transmitted to the presiding officer of each House of the Congress of the United States and to each Wisconsin Member thereof.

THOMAS J. O'MALLEY,
President of the Senate.

R. A. COBBAN,
Chief Clerk of the Senate.

C. T. YOUNG,
Speaker of the Assembly.

JOHN J. SLOCUM,
Chief Clerk of the Assembly.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Colorado, which was referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation:

STATE OF COLORADO, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,

State of Colorado, ss:

I, Chas. M. Armstrong, secretary of state of the State of Colorado, do hereby certify that the annexed is a full, true, and complete copy of Senate Joint Memorial No. 7, which was filed in this office on the 4th day of May, A.D. 1933, at 4 p.m.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the great seal of the State of Colorado, at the city of Denver, this 4th day of May A.D. 1933.

CHAS. M. ARMSTRONG,
Secretary of State.

By A. G. SNEDEKER, Deputy.

Senate Joint Memorial 7 (by Senators Headlee, Christensen, Unfug, Knous, and Warren; Representatives Woodard, Harney, Sutley, Barron, Atencio, and Fisher)

A joint memorial of the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Colorado, requesting the immediate passage of an act by the Congress of the United States providing for the construction of a drain through the "Closed Basin" of the Rio Grande, in the State of Colorado, and for the surveying of a suitable site for a reservoir, toward the development and conservation of the waters of the Rio Grande Basin in the States of Colorado, New Mexico, and Texas

Whereas on February 12, 1929, there was negotiated between and among the States of Colorado, New Mexico, and Texas, by and through their duly accredited representatives, a certain temporary compact, commonly referred to as the "Rio Grande Compact", relating to the use of the waters of the Rio Grande above Fort Quitman, Tex., which said compact was subsequently approved by the several legislatures of said States; and

Whereas said compact was thereafter approved by the Congress of the United States; and

Whereas said compact contemplates and recognizes the absolute importance of the construction of a drain for the purpose of making tributary to the Rio Grande about 2,000 square miles of area commonly known as the "Closed Basin", which at present has no outlet, and thereby materially augmenting the water supply of said river by draining thereinto all unconsumed waters that are produced in said "Closed Basin" in addition to all such waters as return unconsumed from the lands irrigated within said "Closed Basin" by those waters diverted from said river; and

Whereas said compact further contemplates and recognizes the absolute importance of the construction of a reservoir at some appropriate site on said river in the State of Colorado whereby the flow thereof would be so regulated as to remove the principal causes of any controversies and disputes between and among said States in respect to the use of the waters of said river; and

Whereas it is solemnly claimed in said compact by each and all of the States signatory thereto that a moral obligation rests upon the United States to construct said drain and reservoir, without cost to said States or any of them, in order to alleviate the heavy continuing burden placed upon said States as a result of the treaty between the United States and Mexico, dated May 21, 1906 (34 Stat. 2953), whereby the United States obligated itself to deliver to Mexico annually and forever 60,000 acre-feet of water from said Rio Grande; and

Whereas the United States, in order to insure the fulfillment of the terms of its said treaty with Mexico in respect to the delivery to Mexico, annually and forever, of said 60,000 acre-feet of water, has found it necessary to construct, and has constructed, in the State of New Mexico the Elephant Butte Reservoir, with a capacity of 2,639,000 acre-feet of water; and

Whereas the United States, in order further to insure the fulfillment of the terms of its said treaty with Mexico as aforesaid, has heretofore gone so far as to impose in 1896 an embargo on the construction of reservoirs on the upper Rio Grande, in the San Luis Valley, in the State of Colorado, in consequence of which there has been and is a lack of proper storage facilities in said San Luis Valley; and

Whereas said embargo was subsequently removed in 1925 by the Secretary of the Interior and by him determined to have been illegally initiated and imposed, but only after large areas of land in said San Luis Valley had gone to seed on account of the method of irrigation necessitated by the existence of such embargo; and

Whereas the agreement of the United States under the terms of the aforesaid treaty to deliver to Mexico, annually and forever, 60,000 acre-feet of water from the Rio Grande has placed an increasingly intolerable burden upon the three States of Colorado, New Mexico, and Texas, which, in equity and good conscience, should be borne by the Nation as a whole; and

Whereas, in recognition of the moral obligation resting upon the United States to alleviate the burden so cast upon said three States in consequence of its aforesaid treaty with Mexico, certain bills have at previous sessions of the Congress been introduced appropriating funds to cover the cost of constructing the aforesaid drain and of making a survey incident to the selection of a site for the aforesaid reservoir, one of which bills was passed by the Senate in 1931; and

Whereas the aforesaid compact between said States of Colorado, New Mexico, and Texas is only in the nature of a temporary truce, expiring in 1935, after which time prolonged and costly litigation between and among said States may result unless the water supply of the Rio Grande is augmented, conserved, and regulated by means of the construction of said drain and reservoir; and

Whereas the situation is urgent and requires immediate action at the hands of the Congress; and

Whereas the construction of said drain and reservoir could be had at the present time at a lower cost for labor and materials than at any time since the negotiation of said compact; and

Whereas the construction of said drain and reservoir would provide work for numerous men and thereby tend to relieve unemployment: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the memorialist, the Twenty-ninth General Assembly of the State of Colorado, in regular session—

1. That it do respectfully present this joint memorial to the Congress of the United States, and that it do earnestly urge and solicit the Congress to enact forthwith and with all reasonable expedition such legislation as it may deem appropriate and necessary authorizing and providing for the immediate construction of the aforesaid drain and for the surveying of a suitable site for the aforesaid reservoir at the sole cost of the United States;

2. That it do hereby direct that certified copies of this joint memorial be forwarded at once to the Vice President and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, as the presiding officers of the Congress of the United States, and to Hon. EDWARD P. COSTIGAN and Hon. ALVA B. ADAMS, Senators, and Hon. EDWARD C. TAYLOR, Hon. JOHN A. MARTIN, Hon. FRED CUMMINGS, and Hon. LAWRENCE LEWIS, Representatives from the State of Colorado.

RAY H. TALBOT,
President of the Senate.

Attested:

BYRON G. ROGERS,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of California, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency:

Senate Joint Resolution 19

Adopted in senate April 11, 1933.

J. A. BEEK,
Secretary of the Senate.

Adopted in assembly April 26, 1933.

Private Secretary of the Governor.

Senate Joint Resolution 19, relative to approval by the President of the United States of a project for the completion of the John Muir Trail under the provisions of act of Congress approved March 31, 1933

Whereas the Seventy-third Congress of the United States of America at its first session adopted on March 31, 1933, an act entitled "An act for the relief of unemployment through the performance of useful public works, and for other purposes", under which the President of the United States is authorized to select projects qualifying for construction in accordance with the purpose of the act; and

Whereas the State of California, in cooperation with the United States Government, has for a number of years been constructing a memorial trail, known as the "John Muir Trail", along the Sierra Nevada Range in Yosemite and Sequoia National Parks and in the Sierra and Sequoia National Forests; and

Whereas, this project, being useful for fire-protection purposes, public enjoyment, and general utilization of these Government reservations, is considered well qualified for adoption under the act; and

Whereas the construction work on this project is of such character as to utilize a maximum amount of unskilled labor in proportion to total expenditures, and is of an ideal nature to afford employment to large numbers of men in conformity with the intention of the act approved by the President of the United States on March 31, 1933; and

Whereas the project is at present in such a state of incompleteness as to be only partially useful, and it would be highly desirable that the said John Muir Trail be completed between Yosemite and Sequoia National Parks, and be extended from Yosemite National Park to Lake Tahoe, in El Dorado National Forest, on the north, and be extended southerly from Sequoia

National Park, through the Kern River Canyon, to connect with the national-forest road system of Sequoia National Forest: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and the Assembly of the State of California, jointly, at the fiftieth session of the California Legislature, commencing on the 2d day of January 1933, a majority of all the members elected to each house of said legislature voting in favor thereof, That the President of the United States be respectfully requested to adopt the John Muir Trail as a unit in the program under said Emergency Unemployment Relief Act, and cause said project, together with said extensions and incidental facilities necessary to the safety and protection of the users thereof, to be completed during the current calendar year.

Resolved further, That certified copies of the foregoing resolution be forwarded by the Governor of the State of California to the President of the United States, to the Secretary of the United States Department of Agriculture, and to each of the Senators and Representatives of the State of California in Congress.

Senate Joint Resolution 18, relative to memorializing the Congress of the United States to adopt legislation protecting and fostering the rubber industry of the United States

Whereas one of the greatest needs of this nation is immediate relief of unemployment, both agricultural and industrial, and normally functioning private industry offers the most desirable employment opportunities; and

Whereas it has been fully demonstrated and proven that a large portion of the rubber consumed in the United States could and would be produced in the United States if the industry was properly assisted and protected; and

Whereas the production of rubber used in the United States would necessitate the use of thousands of acres of land now producing competitive crops that are actually not bringing the producers the cost of production, but are serving to produce an overproduction of various crops, thereby lessening the profits to all concerned; and

Whereas the milling of the rubber would require the construction of many mills, thereby giving the different industries involved in producing materials for such factory construction, employment, and the actual operation of said mills would give employment to large numbers of industrial workers; and

Whereas the Government of the United States is being deprived of vast customs revenue which are so vitally needed at this time; and

Whereas there are several thousands of acres of Guayule rubber in the Salinas and Santa Maria Valleys, which is ready to be harvested and made into rubber, but which is not being harvested due to the present price of rubber; and

Whereas the immediate need is a clause in Government supply bills requiring the purchase of rubber grown in the United States, in the same manner that other American products are included: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and the Assembly of the State of California jointly, That the Legislature of the State of California respectfully urges and memorializes the Congress of the United States, now in special session, to enact legislation imposing a tariff on rubber and to include in the Government supply bills a requirement that rubber purchased be grown in the United States; and be it further

Resolved, That the Legislature of the State of California requests the honorable Senators and Representatives in the Congress of the United States to use every honorable means to secure the adoption of such legislation; and be it further

Resolved, That the Governor is respectfully requested to send copies of this resolution to the President of the United States and to the Senators and Representatives of the State of California in Congress; and be it further

Resolved, That the Governor is respectfully requested to send copies of this resolution to the governors of all the States of the United States requesting that the legislatures of all the States pass and present similar memorials to Congress.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the Veterans' Association of the Seventy-fourth Infantry, New York National Guard, of Buffalo, N.Y., protesting against reduction of the armed forces of the Nation, particularly the National Guard, which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented a resolution adopted by Binghamton Post, No. 80, the American Legion, of Binghamton, N.Y., protesting against reduction in the armed forces of the Nation and favoring the maintenance of training for the Army, Navy, and all civilian components thereof, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Port Commission of the City of Rochester, N.Y., protesting against the transfer of jurisdiction over river and harbor work from the Engineer Corps of the Army to the Department of the Interior or a newly organized department of public works, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the official board of the Buffalo Street Methodist Episcopal Church, of Jamestown, N.Y., condemning the alleged action of certain public men in ignoring the oath of office, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. JOHNSON presented the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of California, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads:

Senate Joint Resolution 11 relating to memorializing Congress and Postmaster General Brown to adopt legislation or to permit the issuance of postage stamps commemorating the sixtieth anniversary of the planting of the parent Washington navel orange trees in honor of the California citrus industry

Whereas in December 1873 Luther C. Tibbets, Riverside colonist, received from a friend in Washington, D.C., two small Washington navel orange trees of the seedless variety which had been imported from the city of Bahia in Brazil by the Agricultural Department of the United States; and

Whereas in the same year, to wit, 1873, Mrs. L. C. Tibbets planted said navel orange trees in the city of Riverside, then a part of San Bernardino County, State of California; and

Whereas the navel orange industry of the State of California in the years that have followed has grown to an industry with an annual income of approximately $67,000,000; and

Whereas the aforementioned planting by these pioneers of the West has meant much and contributed greatly to the agricultural industry of the State of California and of the United States; and

Whereas the people of the city of Riverside, county of Riverside, State of California, wish to commemorate the sixtieth anniversary of the planting of the said parent Washington navel orange trees, as aforesaid, in honor of the great California citrus industry by having a special postage stamp issued by the Post Office Department of the United States in commemoration of the said sixtieth anniversary of the aforesaid planting: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Assembly and the Senate of the State of California, jointly, That the legislature of said State urgently petition and request the Congress of the United States and/or the Postmaster General, of the Post Office Department of the United States, to adopt legislation to effect or permit the issuance of postage stamps commemorating the sixtieth anniversary of the planting of the parent Washington navel orange trees in honor of California citrus industry; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to the President of the United States, the Vice President, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to the Senators and Representatives of the State of California in Congress, and to the Postmaster of the United States.

Mr. TRAMMELL presented the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Florida, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

House Concurrent Resolution 8

Whereas it has unofficially come to the attention of this legislature that it is proposed by Executive order under the recent economy bill passed by the United States Congress to discontinue the annual field training period for the Florida National Guard, at least during 1933, and reduce the armory drills by at least half the number now authorized, and also to dispense with a large number of Regular Army officer personnel and eliminate the Officers' Reserve Corps and the citizens' military training camps in fact, if not on paper, by so crippling the ability of same to function that the morale of same will be impaired to the destruction of efficiency; and

Whereas the Legislature of the State of Florida believes that the maintenance of an adequate national defense has one of the first claims on government, being one of the five purposes recited in the preamble to the United States Constitution as the reason for agreeing to that document, and is opposed to any of the proposed measures contemplating the elimination of the field training for the National Guard, either temporarily or permanently, as well as to the reduction to any degree, temporarily or permanently, of the number of authorized drills for the National Guard, and believes that the present officer personnel of the Regular Army is needed to properly train the National Guard, Reverse Officers' Training Corps, citizens' military training camps, and Officers' Reserve Corps, as well as function as instructors in our schools, and is of the opinion that the citizens' military training camps serve not only as a means for training the young men but is a relief against unemployment as well for the period covered by such camps each year: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the house of representatives (the senate concurring), That the Legislature of the State of Florida most earnestly protests against any of the actions contemplated against our system of national defense as recited in this resolution and directs that the secretary of state forthwith forward by air mail under the great seal of the State of Florida a copy of this resolution to our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

Approved by the Governor of Florida May 2, 1933.

STATE OF FLORIDA,

Office Secretary of State, ss:

I, R. A. Gray, secretary of state of the State of Florida, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a true and correct copy of House Concurrent Resolution No. 8, passed by the Legislature of Florida, session 1933, and filed in this office.

Mr. TRAMMELL also presented the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Florida, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads:

Senate Concurrent Resolution 12

Whereas the Legislature of the State of Florida by joint resolution in 1929 memorialized Congress, the Federal Bureau of Public Roads, and the State Road Department of Florida to use every possible effort to federalize the Gulf Coast Highway, which is legally known as "State roads 10, 15, and 115"; and

Whereas the resolution referred to above has only been partially carried out; and

Whereas the State of Florida and the counties of the Gulf coast of Florida have spent approximately $15,000,000, and the funds of both the State and counties are now exhausted; and

Whereas all of the Gulf coast counties and cities and civic bodies have passed resolutions setting forth the necessity for continuing the construction of the Gulf Coast Highway in order to relieve the distressing unemployment situation in the Gulf coast counties and cities owing to the serious decline in the oyster, fishing, and other businesses peculiar to these counties and cities; and

Whereas the State road system of Florida cannot be properly rounded out and completed, nor can the hundreds of millions of dollars invested therein begin to pay a full return on this investment until the Gulf Coast Highway is completed; and

Whereas the construction of the Gulf Coast Highway has been officially declared of military and strategic importance to the United States Government; and

Whereas the public-works committee now arranging the public-works program for President Roosevelt has the authority and power to include in said program the construction of Federal roads; and

Whereas road construction in Florida will provide work for the relief of unemployment both in direct employment and in the manufacture and transportation of Florida road-building material: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of the State of Florida (the house of representatives concurring), That the public-works committee of President Roosevelt, the Federal Bureau of Public Works, our Senators and Congressmen in Washington, the Governor of Florida, and the State road department, are hereby requested to secure the immediate federalization of all of the Gulf Coast Highway and to use every effort at their command to allocate funds to Florida for the immediate construction of the Gulf Coast Highway in this State; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded by the secretary of state of Florida, under the great seal of the State of Florida in due form to the Congress of the United States and the several Members thereof from Florida, to the Governor of Florida, and to the State road department.

Approved by the Governor of Florida, May 2, 1933.

GREAT LAKES-ST. LAWRENCE DEEP WATERWAY TREATY

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the record copy of a concurrent resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of South Dakota, which I send to the desk, memorializing the Senate to ratify the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence River Seaway Treaty with Canada.

The concurrent resolution was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senate Concurrent Resolution 2 (Introduced by Mr. Halvorson)

A concurrent resolution, memorializing the Senate of the United States to ratify the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Seaway Treaty with Canada

Be it resolved by the Senate of the State of South Dakota (the house of representatives concurring):

Whereas a treaty has been negotiated between the Government of the United States and the Canadian Government, known as the "Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Seaway Treaty", which said treaty is now being considered by the Foreign Relations Committee of the United States Senate, under the terms of which there is to be built a seaway connecting the Great Inland Lakes of North America with the ocean by the widening and deepening of the St. Lawrence River, thereby transforming all our lake ports into ocean ports with direct connection with the great tidewater markets of the world; and

Whereas transportation is one of the largest cost factors in doing all classes of business, which cost is paid by either the producer or the consumer, and transportation by water is admittedly the most economical and advantageous to all interests as a whole, and particularly to the interior of the Nation now far removed from the world's ocean ports now enjoying low transportation costs; and

Whereas the construction and building of a seaway is deemed to be a permanent benefit and advantage to the United States, and particularly the several interior States located upon and in close proximity to the Great Lakes ports, and also particularly advantageous to agriculture in that it would reduce the freight transportation costs on all farm commodities: Now, therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate of the State of South Dakota (the house of representatives concurring), That we respectfully memorialize the Senate of the United States to ratify the pending Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Seaway Treaty, and respectfully urge and request the Honorable PETER NORBECK and Hon. WILLIAM J. BULOW, United States Senators from the State of South Dakota, to support said ratification; and be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of state is hereby directed to transmit copies of this memorial to His Excellency the President of the United States Senate, and to each of the 96 United States Senators. Adopted by the senate, January 12, 1933.

Adopted by the house of representatives, February 27, 1933.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, I desire to introduce a bill designed to provide an adequate public-works program. The bill is offered on behalf of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CUTTING], and myself.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 1596) to create an administration of public works, to provide for the construction, extension, and improvement of public facilities and services, to relieve unemployment, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

INVESTIGATION OF RACKETS AND RACKETEERING

Mr. COPELAND submitted the following resolution (S.Res. 74), which was referred to the Committee on Commerce:

Whereas there have grown up in this country numbers of so-called "rackets", newspapers being filled with accounts of "beer rackets", "poultry rackets", "milk rackets", other "food rackets", "laundry rackets", "drug rackets", and other similar schemes for the exploitation, deception, and terrorizing of our citizens; and

Whereas the legitimate trade and commerce of the country, as well as the general welfare of our people, demand that, so far as the Federal Government can accomplish it, all these forms of racketeering should cease: Be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce, or a subcommittee thereof, be authorized to investigate the whole subject and recommend to the Senate what action or legislation is needed to destroy this growing evil.

SALARY SCHEDULES OF BANKS, RAILROADS, PUBLIC UTILITIES, ETC.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, I submit a resolution, and ask that it may lie on the table.

The resolution (S.Res. 75) was read and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

Resolved, That the Federal Reserve Board is requested to prepare and transmit to the Senate, as soon as practicable, a report showing the salary schedule of the executive officers and directors of each Federal Reserve bank and member bank of the Federal Reserve System.

For the purposes of this resolution the term "salary" includes any compensation, fee, bonus, commission, or other payment, direct or indirect, in money or otherwise, for personal services.

REMONETIZATION OF SILVER

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, on Wednesday last I submitted a resolution and asked that it lie on the table. I desire now to call up the resolution and have it read, and I then should like to ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration. I do not think there will be any objection to it upon the part of any Senator, or that it will lead to any discussion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S.Res. 67) submitted by Mr. WHEELER on May 3, 1933, as follows:

Whereas the whole world, including the United States of America, is suffering from an unprecedented depression, resulting in unemployment, starvation, falling commodity prices, and the collapse of the financial structure, which in turn threatens to destroy our present social and economic system; and

Whereas all thoughtful students of economics and finance are agreed that one of the chief causes of this depression is due to the shortage and maldistribution of gold, which is today the primary money of the world, seven creditor nations having $9,000,000,000 of gold out of a total world supply of about $11,000,000,000, which in turn leaves only $2,000,000,000 of gold for all the debtor nations of the world; and

Whereas increasing the value of gold held by these seven creditor nations will not increase the purchasing power of the rest of the world, nor give them primary money on which to base credit and with which to carry on their domestic and foreign trade; and

Whereas more than 40 countries are off the gold standard, including England and the United States of America, and 60 per cent of the population of the world use silver as their monetary yardstick, and will continue to use it regardless of all efforts to place them on a gold- or managed-currency basis; and

Whereas the stabilization of currency exchange and the removal of trade barriers between nations is essential in order to successfully conduct foreign trade and commerce; and

Whereas this stabilization of exchanges of world currencies can best be accomplished by fixing the ratio of value between the two metals, silver and gold, upon which world currencies are based; and

Whereas the depreciated currencies of silver-using nations, due to the low price of silver, gives silver-using nations a lower cost of production than gold-using nations, which in turn makes it impossible for gold-using nations to successfully compete with silver-using nations in the markets of the world; and

Whereas the remonetization of silver at its historic ratio with gold would raise world commodity prices upon which our surplus products of farm and factory are sold, increase the purchasing power of silver-using countries in the United States, increase production costs in silver-using countries so that the American farmer and manufacturer would not be so handicapped by their depreciated currencies; and

Whereas the remonetization of silver would end the present uncertainty relative to inflation; and

Whereas both Democratic and Republican national platforms have favored the international remonetization of silver, and Republican and Democratic leaders in the United States Congress have repeatedly stated that they favored bimetallism if it could be on an international basis; and

Whereas the President is about to appoint delegates to attend an international conference to be held in London in June of this year of our Lord 1933, which has for its purpose the stabilization of international exchange, etc.: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate of the United States that the delegates so appointed by the President of the United States of America shall work unceasingly for an international agreement to remonetize silver on a basis of a definite fixed ratio of not to exceed 16 fine ounces of silver to 1 fine ounce of gold.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and agreed to.

The preamble was agreed to.

FRENCH WAR TAXES

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I have in my hand an article published in the Washington Herald of April 28, 1933, written by Edwin D. Schoonmaker under the title "France Has Dodged All War Taxes; Fought on Borrowed Money, Says Expert." I ask that the portions of the article which I have marked may be incorporated in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The excerpts referred to are as follows:

[From the Washington Herald, Apr. 28, 1933]

It will be an astonishing revelation to the vast majority of people who lived through those days to learn that there was one country which had no war tax, and that country was France.

The late Charles Gide, eminent French economist, author of many books and a Sorbonne professor, said in the Economic Journal, June 1919 (the question of war debts had not come up for discussion):

"For many a working or peasant family in France the Great War will have been a veritable golden age, the memory of which will be handed down from generation to generation as a fabulous time when neither taxes nor rents were paid, and the end of which was much to be regretted. . . ."

"The French Government has performed a feat of carrying on the most expensive of all wars without requiring the French taxpayer to contribute a single penny."

Well might M. Gide call this a "feat", for that is what it is, a "feat" without parallel in history. Other countries sent both their money and their men to war. France, it would seem, sent only her men.

RELIEF OF UNEMPLOYMENT—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. FLETCHER submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 4606) to provide for cooperation by the Federal Government with the several States and Territories and the District of Columbia in relieving the hardship and suffering caused by unemployment, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1 and 3, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 2: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 2, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the Senate amendment insert "their appointment may be made and compensation fixed without regard to the civil service laws, or the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, and the Administrator may, in the same manner, appoint and fix the compensation of"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 4: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 4, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the Senate amendment insert "The Administrator may, under rules and regulations prescribed by the President, assume control of the administration in any State or States where, in his judgment, more effective and efficient cooperation between the State and Federal authorities may thereby be secured in carrying out the purposes of this act"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 5: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 5, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Omit the matter proposed to be inserted by the Senate amendment, and on page 8, line 3, of the House bill, after "Hawaii," insert "the Virgin Islands,"; and the Senate agree to the same.

DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
ROBERT F. WAGNER,
PETER NORBECK,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
HENRY B. STEAGALL,
T. ALAN GOLDSBOROUGH,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was agreed to.

THE CALENDAR

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed until the hour of 2 o'clock with the consideration of unobjected bills on the calendar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I have no objection, as I said to the Senator, provided that the limitation provided by rule VIII restricting debate to 5 minutes shall be understood to apply.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request as modified? The Chair hears none, and the clerk will report the first bill on the calendar.

THE WHALING INDUSTRY

The joint resolution (S.J.Res. 15) extending to the whaling industry certain benefits granted under section 11 of the Merchant Marine Act, 1920, was announced as first in order.

Mr. KING. Let the joint resolution go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be passed over.

Mr. COPELAND subsequently said: Mr. President, I want to say just a word about the first measure on the calendar, which was passed over, and I should like to have the attention of the Senator from Tennessee. I refer to Senate Joint Resolution 15, extending to the whaling industry certain benefits granted under section 11 of the Merchant Marine Act of 1920.

A few days ago when this joint resolution was reached on the calendar the Senator from Tennessee asked me to obtain from the Shipping Board a statement of the facts regarding the construction loan fund.

I have the statement in my hand, in a letter from Admiral Cone, showing that the total loans authorized have amounted to $147,000,000 in round numbers, and that the amount now outstanding against mail-contract vessels is $107,000,000. Fifteen and a half million dollars has been repaid, and as a result of our activities we have built 57 new ships and converted 40 ships, and the total cost of the vessels has been $213,000,000. Standing against that is the amount of about $125,000,000. It is surprising how very little of the money owing is past due. The amount is less than $2,000,000. The balance in the construction-loan fund is $14,314,000.

I ask that the letter and the figures to which I have referred may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED STATES SHIPPING BOARD,
Washington, May 5, 1933.

HON. ROYAL S. COPELAND,
United States Senate, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR SENATOR COPELAND: In accordance with your request for general information relative to construction-loan fund, I have prepared and am forwarding herewith a memorandum which will, I believe, give you a clear understanding of the status of the construction-loan fund at the present time.

Should you desire any more detailed information regarding this subject, kindly advise me.

Yours very truly,

H. I. CONE, Chairman.

MEMORANDUM REGARDING CONSTRUCTION-LOAN FUND AS MAINTAINED UNDER PROVISIONS OF MERCHANT MARINE ACT OF 1920, AS AMENDED

Total loans authorized, $147,680,566.66.
Total amount repaid, $15,415,982.54.
Number of vessels, new and converted, 57 new, 40 converted.
Total cost vessels, new and converted, $213,984,579.30.
Total amount of interest paid to the Government on loans authorized up to December 31, 1932, $8,017,030.52.
Average rate of interest return to United States on outstanding construction loans as of December 31, 1932, 4 percent.
Total amount due the Government on construction loans made to companies receiving aid under mail contracts as of December 31, 1932, $107,868,508.
Total amount of construction-loan notes past due as of April 30, 1933, $1,973,566.
Total amount of construction-loan notes past due as of March 31, 1933, from companies receiving aid under mail contracts, $1,570,525.
As of April 30, 1933, the cash balance in the construction-loan fund was $14,314,967.10.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, in view of the fact that the loan fund has been faultlessly and properly used, I hope that the next time the joint resolution is reached on the calendar it may be given some consideration.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 682) to prohibit financial transactions with any foreign government in default on its obligations to the United States was announced as next in order.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I invite the attention of Senators to the fact that the bill, if passed in its present form, would prohibit any citizen of the United States who has been fraudulently or otherwise induced to buy the bonds of a foreign government from selling such securities to any other person in the United States.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. REED. Let me finish my sentence so the RECORD will show that what I am attempting to say makes sense.

Mr. JOHNSON. Without for an instance conceding that what the Senator said, in his own language, makes any sense, it is my bill and I consent that it may go over.

Mr. REED. In order that the RECORD may be complete, I should like to add that the bill itself does not make sense; consequently it is a little difficult to discuss it in terms that would please the Senator from California.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is a matter metaphysical in character and we may determine it perhaps in spite of the words used by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

PROTECTION OF GOVERNMENT RECORDS

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H.R. 4220) for the protection of Government records, which had been reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That whoever, by virtue of his employment by the United States, shall obtain from another or having custody of or access to, or having had custody of or access to, any official diplomatic code or any matter prepared in any such code, or which purports to have been prepared in any such code, shall willfully, without authorization or competent authority, publish or furnish to another any such code or matter, or any matter which was obtained while in the process of transmission between any foreign government and its diplomatic mission in the United States, shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than 10 years, or both.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment to the committee amendment. On page 3, line 9, after the word "code", I suggest the insertion of the word "and."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will report the amendment to the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. In the committee amendment, on page 3, line 9, after the word "code", it is proposed to insert the word "and."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

Mr. JOHNSON subsequently said: Mr. President, I was called from the Chamber for just a moment. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON] has informed me that in that moment while I was absent the bill (H.R. 4220) for the protection of Government records was passed. Is that correct?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It was passed with an amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON].

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask unanimous consent to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed and that it may be restored to the calendar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the vote whereby the bill passed is reconsidered.

Mr. JOHNSON. I wish to say to the Senator from Arkansas that I have no desire to delay the consideration of the bill at all, but we cannot act upon it under the 5-minute rule. I shall be compelled to object to its consideration under the 5-minute limitation of debate, but I shall be very glad to consent that it may be taken up at any time the Senator from Arkansas shall desire.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I think we may be able to take it up immediately after the call of the calendar is concluded.

The VICE PRESIDENT. On objection of the Senator from California, the bill will go over.

BILLS PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 875) to provide for the furnishing of information and the supervision of traffic in investment securities in interstate commerce was announced as next in order.

Mr. REED. Over.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I should like to give notice that as soon as the call of the calendar is concluded and immediately following the disposition of the measure just referred to by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], I shall ask to take up this bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. On objection of the Senator from Pennsylvania, the bill goes over temporarily.

The bill (S. 317) authorizing the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to make advances to the reclamation fund was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the bill textually has been incorporated in the farm relief bill as it passed the Senate several days ago. In view of that fact, the bill should be passed over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

FRANCIS N. DOMINICK

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 727) for the relief of Francis N. Dominick, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, on page 1, line 10, after the numerals "1903", to insert:

Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of the pension laws or any laws conferring rights, privileges, or benefits upon persons honorably discharged from the United States Army Francis N. Dominick shall be held and considered to have served without desertion as a private, Sixty-sixth Company, United States Coast Artillery Corps, United States Army, and to have been honorably discharged from such service on October 19, 1903: Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 882) to provide for the more effective supervision of foreign commercial transactions, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, this is a measure of very great importance. Under the 5-minute rule I doubt whether it could be properly considered. Therefore I suggest that it go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

AMENDMENT TO EMERGENCY BANKING ACT

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1425) to amend the act entitled "An act to provide relief in the existing national emergency in banking, and for other purposes", approved March 9, 1933.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, may we have an explanation of the bill?

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, an explanation of the bill is found in the report, which is very brief. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation, in sending it to us, submitted:

(a) A proposed amendment to the present emergency legislation providing for subscriptions to and loans upon preferred stock of national banks by this Corporation.

(b) A copy of a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury concerning the proposed amendment.

(c) A detailed statement of the reasons for and the purposes of the amendment which you may wish to read if you have time.

Briefly, the amendment straightens out certain difficulties this Corporation has met in working out the combination of the emergency banking legislation and the National Bank Act, concerning:

(a) The issuance of more than one class of preferred stock by such banks, as for instance, first and second preferred stock.

(b) The payment of dividends upon such stock despite impairment of any stock that is subordinate to the preferred stock.

(c) The replacement of directors by the holders of preferred stock when they are entitled to take control of a bank.

(d) The representation of this Corporation upon boards of such banks by its nominees.

The proposed amendment is respectfully submitted for the consideration of the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. REED. I want to inquire of the Senator who reported the bill whether the preferred stock that is subscribed would be subject to the additional liability to which the common stock is subject?

Mr. FLETCHER. No; it would not be.

Mr. REED. Why not? What is there in the bill that would take away such double liability?

Mr. FLETCHER. There is a clause in the bill expressly so providing.

Mr. REED. I do not see any such provision.

Mr. FLETCHER. At the bottom of page 3 is this provision:

The holders of such preferred stock shall not be held individually responsible as such holders for any debts, contracts, or engagements of such association, and shall not be liable for assessments to restore impairments in the capital of such association as now provided by law with reference to holders of common stock.

Mr. REED. I thank the Senator.

Mr. FLETCHER. That is expressly provided for.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act to provide relief in the existing national emergency in banking, and for other purposes", approved March 9, 1933, is amended by—

(a) Striking out the whole of section 301 of title III thereof and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"Sec. 301. Notwithstanding any other provision of law, any national banking association may, with the approval of the Comptroller of the Currency and by vote of shareholders owning a majority of the stock of such association, upon not less than 5 days' notice, given by registered mail pursuant to action taken by its board of directors, issue preferred stock of one or more classes, in such amount and with such par value as shall be approved by said Comptroller, and make such amendments to its articles of association as may be necessary for this purpose; but, in the case of any newly organized national banking association which has not yet issued common stock, the requirement of notice to and vote of shareholders shall not apply. No issue of preferred stock shall be valid until the par value of all stock so issued shall be paid in."

(b) Striking out the whole of subsection (a) of section 302 of the said title III and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"Notwithstanding any other provision of law, whether relating to restriction upon the payment of dividends upon capital stock or otherwise, the holders of such preferred stock shall be entitled to receive such cumulative dividends at a rate not exceeding 6 percent per annum and shall have such voting and conversion rights and such control of management, and such stock shall be subject to retirement in such manner and upon such conditions as may be provided in the articles of association with the approval of the Comptroller of the Currency. The holders of such preferred stock shall not be held individually responsible as such holders for any debts, contracts, or engagements of such association, and shall not be liable for assessments to restore impairments in the capital of such association as now provided by law with reference to holders of common stock."

(c) Adding to section 304 of said title III the following new paragraph:

"Notwithstanding the provisions of United States Revised Statutes, section 5146, nominees of Reconstruction Finance Corporation shall be qualified as such to act as directors of any national banking association."

EVERGLADES NATIONAL PARK, FLA.

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 324) to provide for the establishment of the Everglades National Park in the State of Florida, and for other purposes.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, a similar measure was before the Senate at the previous session.

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes; and it was passed.

Mr. KING. I should like an explanation of the bill. May I say that the reason why I am making the request is that there is a disposition to create parks everywhere and many of the States, as I am advised, are seeking to turn over to the Federal Government parks which are now under control of and perhaps belong to the States. I was wondering if there is any advantage which may be gained by the Federal Government's taking on the responsibility.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, this is not a park that belongs to the State. It is to be created out of certain territory mentioned in the bill where the lands are very largely privately owned. The lands will have to be purchased under the requirements of the general Public Park Act. A similar bill has been before the Senate on two or three occasions. It has been approved by the Interior Department and the National Park Service, and by the Senate on two different occasions. Two years ago the bill passed the Senate. It was reported favorably again by the Senate committee a year ago, and again passed the Senate. A favorable report was made in the House upon the bill 2 years ago and again a year ago. It came rather late in the session and under the parliamentary procedure in the House the House Members most interested in it were unable to secure its consideration. It is on the Private Calendar in the House, I understand, and one Member can prevent its consideration. We should like very much to get it through the Senate at this time.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I have not had time to read the report. Can the Senator give us any idea of the probable cost involved in the purchase of the land for the park?

Mr. TRAMMELL. It is not going to cost the Federal Government anything. The acquisition of the land and property is entirely upon the State and individuals. The Government only accepts it when it has been purchased and is ready to turn it over to the Government.

Mr. McKELLAR. How much land have they acquired, or will they acquire, before it can be accepted as a public park?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I dare say it represents an area of something like 300,000 or 400,000 acres in all. It is in the extreme southern part of the State, very tropical in character, and ideally located for a tropical park. We have nothing of the kind in the country. It will cost the Federal Government nothing whatever to acquire the land. It will only become a part of the National Park system after it shall have been turned over without cost to the Federal Government.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, my information is that it will cost $20,000,000 for the acquisition of the land. The Senator knows when we attempt to acquire private lands, by condemnation or otherwise, for the Government or a State that those lands take on additional value. It seems to me that if this is an important project the State should take up the matter and should make the necessary arrangements. Let it be made a State park, and after that, if the Government desires to obtain it, then let the State transfer the park to the National Government.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, will my colleague permit me to interrupt and give a little history of the matter?

Mr. TRAMMELL. Certainly.

Mr. FLETCHER. We first passed a bill to have the Department of the Interior and the National Park Service investigate this area and determine whether the park plan suggested was feasible. They did that and made a very favorable report. Then a bill was introduced at the last session similar to the bill now before us. Members of the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys went to Florida and made an investigation and submitted a favorable report confirming what the Park Service had said. We then passed the bill based upon that report.

The bill now before us simply provides for the State to cooperate in every way to see what can be done toward getting title to the area. The Government will do nothing until the survey shall have been made and the lands acquired and the State shall be ready to turn over the land to the Government. The Government is not to be put to any expense whatsoever.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does the Senator know who now owns the lands?

Mr. FLETCHER. The State owns some of the lands and is cooperating in obtaining title to the remainder. A law has been enacted in Florida authorizing the organization of an association which will be empowered to acquire title to the land in their own name and at their own expense, and with no expense to the Government at all. Then, after this shall all have been done, after surveys shall have been made and the lands shall have been acquired, they will be tendered to the Government as a park area.

This bill is necessary, because without it nobody can go to work to find out what this land can be obtained for. If there is much talk about it, probably it will make it impossible to acquire the land. It is the obligation of the people down there to acquire title to this area. The Government has nothing to do with it except to accept it when it is tendered to the Government. Then it becomes a national park, and comes under the jurisdiction of the National Park Service.

Everybody seems to be in favor of it. I do not know of anybody who has ever examined the area, either in the National Park Service or otherwise, who does not favor it. The Secretary of the Interior himself has been there and looked it over and made a report on it. This bill simply lays the foundation for acquiring title to that area.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. And when the title is tendered it is still under section 2 optional with the Secretary whether to accept it or not.

Mr. FLETCHER. Absolutely.

Mr. KING. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. KING. I was about to observe that I think this is a very important bill, and I should like to investigate it further, because I apprehend that a demand will be made upon the Government sooner or later to pay a large part of the cost of this enterprise. If I were satisfied that that would not be done, I should not object to the consideration of the bill; but I object for the present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

Mr. WALCOTT. Mr. President—

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, has the able Senator from Utah objected?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes.

Mr. ASHURST. Will the Senator withhold the objection until I may say a few words?

Mr. KING. Certainly.

Mr. ASHURST. Appreciating the attitude of the able senior Senator from Utah, in the main he is correct in contending that we possibly may have gone too far in establishing parks; but in this particular case, so far as I know, there will be found but few areas on the globe comparable to this tract of land called the Everglades.

It is one of the most romantic and one of the most interesting stretches of country in all the world. The thousands of hummocks or hammocks that have so slowly been built up appear to be small islands set into a sea. The fauna and the flora in the Everglades are diversified; specimens of rare and of great beauty. The Everglades are a stretch of the globe that at once grips the imagination and challenges our lasting interest.

It is common to say "We saw a million birds", or "We caught a million fish"; but I believe that in crossing the Tamiami Trail in the proposed park you will see a million birds of beautiful plumage. It is a haven, a place of refuge for birds. I cannot at this time conceive of any other purpose to which mankind might put this tract of country, save to set it aside as a matchless form of wild life, of tree and flower, although science in the future may find some other use. I believe it to be the duty of Congress to accept for the Nation the gift of this land and to administer it as a national park.

I call attention on page 2, lines 4 to 7, to this language:

That the United States shall not purchase by appropriation of public moneys any land within the aforesaid area, but such lands shall be secured by the United States only by public or private donation.

It may be that the administration of this park will lead to some expense, but it will be well worth the expense. It will be a monument to the idealism of our Nation and a delight to those who seek to preserve one of the most interesting spots of the globe.

There are in the glades a few Seminole Indians who catch plumage birds and live on fish. What rights they have I do not know. I believe, however, that the last paragraph of the bill fully protects the rights the Indians may have in that area.

Mr. WALCOTT. Mr. President—

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection being made, the bill will be passed over.

Mr. WALCOTT. Mr. President, if the bill is going over, I will not take the time of the Senate to speak on it. I very much hoped the Senator from Utah would not object to the consideration of the bill, because I believe it is quite important. Has the bill gone over?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill has gone over.

Mr. WALCOTT. Very well.

SALES OF TIMBER ON INDIAN LAND

The bill (S. 1513) to amend Public Act No. 435 of the Seventy-second Congress, relating to sales of timber on Indian land, was announced as next in order, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Public Act No. 435 of the Seventy-second Congress entitled "An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to modify the terms of existing contracts for the sale of timber on Indian land when it is in the interest of the Indians so to do" is hereby amended by striking from the first section thereof the words "Provided, That the prices are not reduced below the basic sale prices."

Mr. KING. Mr. President—

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I think we ought to have some explanation of this bill.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, I will undertake in just a word to make the explanation requested.

Mr. KING. I shall object to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. STEIWER. On the Klamath Indian Reservation in Oregon some portion of the stumpage belonging to the Indians is under contracts of sale made with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior. The operators who purchase the stumpage and manufacture the timber into lumber do so under executory contracts, the prices in the contracts being subject to progressive increases. The Secretary over the years has made numerous increases; and the timber price now, under most of the contracts, stands at six or seven or eight dollars per thousand. The result is that no operator can cut any timber at all. The Indians, as well as the operators, are very anxious to modify those contracts so that the prices may be put in line with present market conditions.

I will say to the Senator that the Indians subsist from the proceeds of the sale of this stumpage.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield right there?

Mr. STEIWER. In just a moment.

A bill was passed in the last Congress permitting the Secretary of the Interior, with the consent of the Indians and the consent of the operators, to modify these contracts by scaling down prices. In that bill, however, there was a provision that the Secretary could not lower the price below the basic sales price, and it was found in some cases that the basic sales price was still a dollar or $2 or $3 above the existing market. For this reason it was not possible to make any adjustments that would enable any timber to be cut; and the Indians, who are dependent upon the revenues from the timber, are now approaching the point where they will have to be fed by the United States Government.

The only purpose of this bill, introduced by my colleague [Mr. McNARY], was to strike out of the bill of the last Congress the provision that the adjustment could not go below the basic sales price.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. STEIWER. Certainly.

Mr. McKELLAR. This matter has been up a number of times before the Appropriations Committee of the Senate. We have heard much testimony about it. It developed there not long ago that while this lumber was being sold the amount being sold under the contracts had very greatly diminished. Formerly it brought as much as a million dollars, or perhaps $1,200,000, a year. At that time, according to my recollection, there were about 78 or 80 Government employees who had a preferred claim upon all the sales. They came first, and they all had automobiles except three. They were all getting good salaries—from $2,200, as I recall, to about $6,000. They all had homes—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Five minutes has expired.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will use 5 minutes for myself and ask this question of the Senator, if he does not mind—

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is not according to the rule. Debate on each bill is limited to 5 minutes.

Mr. McKELLAR. May I be recognized?

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; 5 minutes was the limit of debate, and the 5 minutes has expired.

Mr. McKELLAR. I did not understand the agreement.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I ask unanimous consent that the time for debate on this bill be extended 5 minutes.

Mr. KING. I object to the consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read the next bill.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Utah to withhold his objection for just a minute?

Mr. KING. Certainly.

Mr. STEIWER. I think possibly the Senator from Utah is disturbed by what has just been said by the Senator from Tennessee. I want to assure both of those Senators that the condition that has been complained about—and I joined in the complaint—has been largely corrected. The delegate of the Klamath Indians who appeared before the committee and objected to those expenditures himself helped prepare the bill now pending. The Indians themselves favor it; and they will be greatly disappointed and seriously injured unless we can clothe the Secretary of the Interior with the power to do the things that are necessary to be done in order to enable some operations to be carried on in that reservation.

Incidentally, among the delegates before the Appropriations Committee, was Mr. Crawford, an Indian. Within recent days he has been appointed to the position of financial clerk on that reservation, and because no agent is maintained there he will assume charge of the operation. Thus the Indians themselves will be in charge of their own affairs; and I do not believe there is any conceivable ground for objection to the proposed bill. The Secretary of the Interior recommends the bill. Mr. Collier, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, recommends the bill. The Indians themselves helped prepare the bill; and I do not know of any purpose that would be served by an objection.

Mr. McKELLAR. Even now more than half of the income due to the Indians is going to Americans who have charge of the work out there.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. FESS. I understood that, on the suggestion of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY], the debate was to be limited under rule VIII to 5 minutes to each Senator. I am wondering whether we are not working under a misunderstanding.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair was in error in making the ruling that only one Senator had 5 minutes.

Mr. KING. I will withdraw my objection temporarily. I have 5 minutes, have I?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator has 5 minutes.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I say to the Senator from Oregon that for a number of years there has been a very acrimonious discussion between the Indians and the Department and the individuals or companies who had contracted to purchase the timber upon the Klamath Reservation. The evidence showed that the representative of the Indian Bureau had, I think without authority, modified the contracts and relieved the contractors of the payment of the amounts which the contracts called for and the Indians thus were robbed of substantial sums. Because there was a decline in the price of lumber and the profits of the contractors were not as great as they anticipated, many of the contractors declined to go forward with their contracts, the result of which was that doubtless they suffered, and, of course, the Indians who relied upon the proceeds derived from the sale of their own timber suffered.

It seemed to me that this was a scheme to evade contracts; to relieve the white contractors and companies from obligations which they entered into with their eyes open. As a matter of fact, they had behind them the Indian Bureau sympathizing with them; and the Indians were the ones who were the victims of these violations of the contracts.

If this measure is to validate the former action of the Indian Bureau and to relieve the contractors from the obligations which they entered into to pay a certain price for the timber, it would seem to me that in good conscience, measured by any standard of ethics and justice, this measure ought not to be passed. I inquire for information in my own time, if I have a few moments, if this plan is to relieve the contractors of valid obligations which they entered into, and to relieve them of back payments which were due to the Indians under contracts, thus diminishing the funds to which the Indians were entitled, and which they ought to have in order to meet their necessities, because this is their source of revenue and income.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. KING. I do.

Mr. STEIWER. If I may answer, this proposal will not relieve the contractors of any existing obligation.

Mr. KING. How about past obligations?

Mr. STEIWER. I understand it will not affect past obligations at all. It will permit the Secretary, with the consent of the operator and the Indian, in the case where the Secretary thinks it is to the interest of the Indian, to make a lower price for the future.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I shall withdraw my objection, with this understanding: I shall make further investigation this afternoon, and, if the situation is as I have outlined it, I shall ask the Senator then to consent that a motion to reconsider may be entered, and the bill restored to the calendar for consideration. I want to protect the Indians because I know from investigation that they have been shamefully robbed in the past, not only on this reservation, but on various other reservations. I withdraw the objection.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I am going to interpose an objection in a moment, but before doing so, I want to state that the expense of handling timber out in that country is greater than what the Indians have received in any one year in the last several years. It is very valuable timber. I have sent down to get the exact figures, and will put them into the RECORD. In other words, I think it would be better, at the present prices of timber, and considering the present cost of handling such timber as is concerned, for the Government to make a straight-out appropriation to the Indians, and keep the timber.

I might be mistaken if I attempted to give the exact figures, and I want to have them correct. We have the figures in the Committee on Appropriations, and I have sent for them. In the meantime I will object, but the next time the bill is reached on the calendar we will have the figures so as to be able intelligently to consider the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. On objection, the bill will be passed over.

Mr. STEIWER subsequently said: Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have added to the remarks I made a little while ago, with respect to the Klamath Indian bill (S. 1513), a copy of the report of the Secretary of the Interior on the measure.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, May 1, 1933.

HON. BURTON K. WHEELER,
Chairman Committee on Indian Affairs,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: Reference is made to your informal request of April 26, 1933, for a report on S. 1513, which would amend the first section of Public Act No. 435, Seventy-second Congress, approved March 4, 1933, by striking therefrom the words "Provided, That the prices are not reduced below the basic sales prices."

The act now sought to be amended was before the Congress for over a year before being passed, and final action was taken only after serious study by both the Senate Committee and the House Committee on Indian Affairs. Many modifications from the original form in which the bill was introduced resulted. The Department of the Interior did not recommend its passage in the original form, but recognized that relief to the contractors on Indian timber was necessary if operations were to be continued, and offered a substitute bill. In its report it said (72d Cong., 1st sess., H.Rept. No. 1302):

"The situation in the lumber industry is deplorable and the need for relief urgent. It is quite probable that certain purchasers of timber on Indian reservations will be unable to carry their contracts to completion unless the stumpage prices are reduced below the rates per thousand feet originally bid, and that as a result the Indians will suffer substantial losses through such defaults."

It seems to be conceded by those best qualified to know that conditions in the lumber industry are worse now than they were in January 1932, when the above was written. It would seem, and the timber contractors state, that operations cannot be carried on except at a financial loss if relief only to the extent possible under the provisions of the act of March 4, 1933, supra, is provided. Certain of them have requested the amendment proposed in S. 1513 so that prices may be reduced below the basic sales prices.

Hearings were held on April 22 and 24 in the Office of Indian Affairs by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, attended by representatives of the purchasers of Indian timber on the Klamath Reservation and the official delegate to Washington of the Klamath Tribe, who is also chairman of the tribal business committee. It was agreed by both the representatives of the purchasers of Klamath timber and the Klamath delegate that the relief sought is necessary (at least under some of the outstanding contracts) unless the contracts are to be voided.

The act, of course, applies to other reservations, but the largest number of contracts involved is on the Klamath Reservation.

It is to be noted that no action can be taken under the provisions of the act of March 4, 1933, supra, without the consent of the Indians expressed in general council.

I recommend that S. 1513 be enacted into law.

Sincerely yours,

HAROLD L. ICKES,
Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. McKELLAR subsequently said: Mr. President, today in discussing a Klamath Indian bill I stated that there were certain figures in the possession of the Appropriations Committee which I did not have with me at the time, but that I had sent for them. I have since received them, and now ask unanimous consent that I may insert in the RECORD at the conclusion of my earlier remarks excerpts from hearings on the Interior Department appropriation bill for 1934 before the Senate committee and like hearings before the House committee on the bill for 1933.

There being no objection, the excerpts were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From hearings before a subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations, United States Senate, Seventy-second Congress, second session, on H.R. 13710, a bill making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934, and for other purposes]

AUTOMOBILES

As to the automobiles, I might just say that there are 47 cars on that reservation, and none have been purchased within the last 2 years.

Senator McKELLAR. How many do they have there?

Mr. SCATTERGOOD. Forty-seven.

May I just draw you a picture as to the conditions there?

Senator McKELLAR. All right; and then I want to ask you some questions about it.

Mr. SCATTERGOOD. Very well. The number of cars was, of course, large at the time when very large business operations were under way. The reservation itself is some fifty-odd miles long and forty-odd miles wide, with forests scattered over a large part of it, and the agency itself is on the western side, nearly half way, north and south.

Senator McKELLAR. How far in miles; what is the distance?

Mr. SCATTERGOOD (continuing). So that there are many miles to travel to get to the scenes of the forest operations.

Senator McKELLAR. How many miles?

Mr. SCATTERGOOD. Well, it is about 45 miles wide, and the agency is very near the western border, and about 20 miles from the southern boundary, and I should say 30 miles, roughly, from the northern boundary.

Now, to get out to the scenes of operations, when they are operating that is, to where the forest work is done, and where the scaling and where the supervisory work is done, marking of trees, and so on, requires traveling long distances by whoever is engaged in carrying on the work of the reservation. And there are a large number of activities.

Senator McKELLAR. Are these all one-seated cars?

Mr. SCATTERGOOD. All kinds of cars—some trucks; and that is the whole fleet.

Senator McKELLAR. Well, will they not carry more than one person in each car?

Mr. SCATTERGOOD. Of course, we have cars that will.

Senator McKELLAR. And does every person have to have a car?

Mr. SCATTERGOOD. As a matter of fact, we have now 27 employees, so that there would be almost 2 cars to the employee, if you count all the fleet that was needed for the peak load of lumber operations, and that are still on hand.

Senator McKELLAR. Twenty-seven employees and 47 cars.

Mr. SCATTERGOOD. If you want to take it that way. But, of course, not all of them are in use now, and it is not a fact that there is a car for every employee's use.

Senator McKELLAR. What is your gasoline bill for those 47 cars on that reservation, what are you paying for gasoline and oil, what did you pay for gasoline and oil last year?

Mr. SCATTERGOOD. Well, we would have to find out from the superintendent what that amounted to.

"Five thousand three hundred and four dollars and ten cents. This includes gasoline and oil for passenger-carrying vehicles and trucks engaged in road, beetle control, fire suppression, timber preservation and care, and other work on the reservation."

Senator McKELLAR. I wish you would get it and furnish it to us, and how much you paid for repairs, and how much these 47 cars cost. I would like to know all of that.

Mr. SCATTERGOOD. We will be glad to get that.

Repairs to automotive equipment, $2,957.24. Purchase price of all cars, $31,328.48.

EMPLOYEES—REDUCTION IN NUMBER

There are 11 forestry employees and 16 agency and hospital employees there at the agency now. That is 27 employees. That number has been reduced from 56. There are 29 vacant positions at the present time.

Senator McKELLAR. But, that was only done after the fight that was carried on here at last session, and we had to bring down public opinion on you gentlemen, because you cut them down only when you had to.

Mr. SCATTERGOOD. I think if you will look into the record that you will find that there was some cutting already taking place. I do not hesitate to say that there may have been some lag in reductions to correspond with the cutting down of the amount of timber operations.

AUTOMOBILES

Senator McKELLAR. I want to ask you this question: Why could you not get along there with one truck to take all of the people out on the reservation every morning, if they want to go there and bring them back every afternoon, and one general passenger car for those who are unable to get around otherwise? Why would not 2 automobiles, 1 truck, and 1 passenger-carrying car do the whole job? If that was in private business, that would be all that would be used.

Mr. SCATTERGOOD. Well, the operations are scattered all over the reservation, and these people have to travel out from the agency in many directions. They do not all go to the same place. They do not all go at the same time.

Senator McKELLAR. I know that; but why could you not take a truck and carry out a great many people in a short space of time?

Mr. SCATTERGOOD. You mean operate it like a school bus and take the people out over the circuit and drop them off?

Senator McKELLAR. Yes; you could do that.

Mr. SCATTERGOOD. That might be possible for certain employees, but when you have the forestry scalers and supervisors going out into remote places, where the cutting is taking place, they go alone to separate places. There would not be anybody else going to the same place, and it would be pure waste of time for the bus to try to go everywhere.

Senator McKELLAR. You could have a passenger car to carry that man, but I cannot see the necessity for the superintendent and the assistant superintendent and every employee and every school teacher and every marker, or scaler, and everybody, except the two stenographers—how many stenographers have you there? Two or three?

Mr. DODD. Six clerks—stenographers.

Senator McKELLAR. Six? How many? How many stenographers? Somebody here said that the stenographers did not have cars.

Mr. DODD. I think that there are three stenographers.

Senator McKELLAR. Three stenographers. I think that is an injustice, if we are going to pursue the plan that is being pursued, or we are pursuing. I want to protest against it, because it is the wrong plan in the first place; but in the second place, I am an old bachelor and I want to protest against the unfair discrimination against giving legalized graft to the others and not giving legalized graft to the stenographers. I think that the stenographer is just as much entitled to a car as any of the rest of us people.

Mr. SCATTERGOOD. Senator, I think that I can say that the only people who use these cars are those who have occasion to travel in connection with their work, unless somebody is breaking the rules. We will be glad, indeed, to consider any plan you suggest for the use of these cars.

Senator McKELLAR. I am going to offer an amendment when it comes time to take that up, to the effect that there be allowed one truck and one passenger car for that reservation. I think that is enough. But before I do that I want to ask for some other information.

Mrs. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, may I say that Mr. Scattergood—I do not wish to engage in an argument with the gentleman—but he has made it appear that they have several activities scattered over the reservation at various points that these people have to go to.

Albert W. Christy had charge of one of the road camps, and he went out there on the road and stayed at the point where he was working, but with some of those employees, they have evidently felt that it was beneath their dignity to live at the place where they were working and stay at that place. They get in a travel status, Mr. Chairman, and they go from the agency to their work, and that puts them in travel status, and they are allowed an automobile, gas, oil, and in addition to that, subsistence. Now, I do not know what that subsistence is, but it is a dollar and a half or two dollars a day.

Senator McKELLAR. They get pay when they are traveling in automobiles, that is, you mean that they get subsistence pay of so much a day?

Mrs. CRAWFORD. Yes, sir; they do, Senator McKELLAR.

Senator McKELLAR. They do?

Mrs. CRAWFORD. Yes, Senator. I do not know how much they get, but they get a dollar and a half or two dollars a day.

Senator McKELLAR. In addition to their regular salaries?

Mrs. CRAWFORD. In addition to their regular salaries.

Senator McKELLAR. Because they are traveling in automobiles, from one place to another?

Mrs. CRAWFORD. Yes, sir; they travel over the highways, and they get travel status. I do not see why they cannot stay at the camp where they are working and do their work. Indians are not allowed to be in travel status. They stay at the camps.

Senator McKELLAR. Are any of these 47 automobiles used by the Indians?

Mrs. CRAWFORD. No, sir; they do not use them.

Senator McKELLAR. Do they need 47 automobiles to run that reservation?

Mrs. CRAWFORD. We maintain they do not. Of course, it is quite true that they have had 57 or 60 employees, and 47 automobiles. But we are not getting any income now, anything like what it was 5 or 6 years ago. Our appropriation ought to be reduced to meet the situation we are facing today.

Senator McKELLAR. Well, let me ask you this: What could they get along with out there in the way of automobiles and trucks? Would one truck and one automobile carry these people when it is necessary and where it is necessary for them to go?

Mrs. CRAWFORD. Well, if they stayed out in the camps, they could have somebody take them out at the end of the week when they go back to their work. Perhaps they could stay over the week-end at the agency.

Senator McKELLAR. Yes; but if they did that, they could not get any travel pay—extra travel pay?

Mrs. CRAWFORD. No; they would not; they would not be in travel status.

Senator BRATTON. How many Klamath Indians are there?

Senator McKELLAR. I am surprised that you have got any timber or property there at all.

Mrs. CRAWFORD. There are thirteen hundred Indians.

Senator BRATTON. Thirteen hundred?

Mrs. CRAWFORD. Yes, sir.

Senator BRATTON. What is the size of the reservation?

Mrs. CRAWFORD. Forty-five by sixty miles; approximately 1,110,000 acres.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I want to say this for your information: That we do not have any activity out there that is alive. Our timber industry is dead—the lumbermen are not operating. That is the thing that I want the committee to consider and have been trying to get the Department to consider, and remember that we are not doing anything out there and Superintendent Blair stated so in this letter that I referred to in the House hearings. In the letter to the Commissioner he states that they are not doing anything out there.

Senator McKELLAR. Will you wait 1 minute while I ask Mr. Scattergood a question?

Mr. CRAWFORD. Yes, Senator.

TRAVEL PAY OF EMPLOYEES

Senator McKELLAR. I wish you would give us the figures as to how many of these men have been drawing travel pay, getting these automobiles, and then drawing travel pay in addition to their salaries?

Mr. SCATTERGOOD. We will try to look that up. As a matter of fact, I think that the rule is that if they start out before 8 o'clock in the morning and are kept on official business throughout all of the day and do not get back until—I think it is—7 o'clock at night that then only can they get any consideration for travel.

Now, I know that many of them—

Senator McKELLAR. That means that they have to start out, and stay out until they can make their travel pay, and they are given, in addition, their salaries that they now receive, which, if I remember, vary from between $5,800 down to $2,000, or down as low as $2,000. I think that is about the lowest. It may be $1,800. They may then travel, and that is extra, and they travel in Government automobiles, run with Government gasoline, or Indian gasoline, and Indian automobiles, and then in addition to that you gentlemen are allowing this additional dollar and a half for travel pay on those circumstances. You ought, every one of you, to be removed from office; you ought, every one of you, to be removed.

Mr. SCATTERGOOD. Let me say this, that if they are doing official work, and then only when they are out for a certain length of time. I have been personally on that reservation with those people when they could not even charge up their lunches—when they had to pay for their own lunch and when they were at a place 20 miles away from home and had to go to a restaurant and pay for their own meals, and they could not get any Government allowance for that.

Senator McKELLAR. That is about the only thing that they could not get a Government allowance for?

Mr. SCATTERGOOD. No. Those persons are not dishonest and trying to beat the Government. They are allowed only such expenses as are authorized by the standard travel regulations promulgated by the Comptroller General for the entire Government service.

Senator McKELLAR. You may think it is all right, but I want to tell you here is one man that does not think it is right.

Mr. SCATTERGOOD. We want first to try to get the facts in the case and let us all pass upon the facts.

Senator BRATTON. How many employees are there on that agency?

Mr. SCATTERGOOD. Twenty-seven employees; 11 in the forestry service now and 16 in the hospital and agency. That has been reduced from a total of 56 in 1929. There are 29 vacancies there at the present time.

It is perfectly true that there is virtually nothing going on in the way of timber operations at the present time. I was picturing a situation when in normal times there were 12 operating companies with scattered points of operations many miles away from the agency. That was the sort of condition that the scalars and other supervisory people had to meet and they had to reach every day several points, and they could not make collective trips.

Now, at the present time it is different, but we have these left-over automobiles.

Now, they are not used to the extent of anything like one automobile to the employee. We have not bought any new cars in 2 years, and there is no real abuse in this. It makes a big picture, of course, and it makes it as if there were a lot of joy riding going on around there. If there is, we will clear it up.

Senator BRATTON. Let me ask you this: You say that you have 29 employees now?

Senator McKELLAR. Twenty-seven.

Mr. SCATTERGOOD. Twenty-seven.

Senator BRATTON. Twenty-nine vacancies; not 29 employees.

Mr. SCATTERGOOD. Yes.

Senator BRATTON. Over what period of time have you reduced the personnel by 29?

Senator McKELLAR. My recollection is that there were 47 last year, when we made a very active fight.

Mr. SCATTERGOOD. That was at the time of the hearings, Senator, last spring. We have been reducing, as these operations have been cut down, through the last year, to a considerable amount, but even before that we were reducing the personnel at the agency.

As I said before you came in, Senator BRATTON, there may have been some lag in the adjustments.

Senator McKELLAR. Wait just 1 minute.

Mr. SCATTERGOOD. But this is how it has worked out.

Senator McKELLAR. Wait 1 minute.

Mr. SCATTERGOOD (continuing). We have tried to cut them down. Senator McKELLAR. You are talking about reductions. Will you give us your reductions from 1929 to 1930, and 1930 to 1931, and 1931 to 1932, and on up to the present time? Give us the reductions by years. My recollection now is, on these reductions, that they only took place after the debate on the floor of the Senate here last spring or summer. That is my recollection.

Mr. SCATTERGOOD. As I say, there was some lag, but remember that the depression did not become so virulent, so very virulent, until the last year. Throughout 1931 there were still considerable operations going on. In 1932 there was very little. The number of positions carried on the approved salary list for the years beginning July 1, 1929, 1930, 1931, and 1932, are as follows:

July 1, 1929 (fiscal year 1930).....	55
July 1, 1930 (fiscal year 1931).....	57
July 1, 1931 (fiscal year 1932).....	57
July 1, 1932 (fiscal year 1933).....	38

While 38 positions were authorized for 1933, the number has been reduced since July 1, 1932, to 27.

Senator McKELLAR. Now, I want to ask you another question. Do these people all live in separate houses?

HOUSING OF EMPLOYEES

Mr. SCATTERGOOD. Yes; there are a good many different houses. Some of them live in the employees' club.

Senator McKELLAR. Employees' club?

Mr. SCATTERGOOD. The unmarried employees.

Senator McKELLAR. Do they pay rent?

Mr. SCATTERGOOD. Yes; every employee pays rent.

Senator McKELLAR. Pays rent?

Mr. SCATTERGOOD. Yes.

Senator McKELLAR. To whom does he pay rent?

Mr. SCATTERGOOD. Well, it is deducted from their salaries, and there is a regular scale for it.

Senator McKELLAR. There is a regular scale for rent?

Mr. SCATTERGOOD. Yes.

Senator McKELLAR. Will you give us the facts about the rents which they pay for their houses? Does the superintendent have to pay for his house?

Mr. SCATTERGOOD. Yes.

Senator McKELLAR. How much deduction is there for rent?

Mr. DODD. The $1,200 man gets $120 taken from his salary, and beginning with about $1,500 a year up to $2,000, they take away $180; from $2,000 up to possibly $3,000 it is $240; and then the superintendent would have deducted $400 from his salary for the quarters he occupies.

Senator BRATTON. That is a uniform scale applicable throughout the system or the service?

Mr. DODD. Yes, sir.

Senator McKELLAR. In giving the salaries is that before the deduction or after the deduction?

Mr. DODD. The salaries given in the Budget details are the gross salaries which are paid. Those detailed are the gross salaries without any deductions. And then, if you will notice, we have put in a line at the bottom of the table showing the deductions as allowances for quarters, subsistence, and so forth. Some are fed in the hospital. The nurses, cooks, and other hospital employees are furnished subsistence from the hospital and they have an additional sum deducted from their salaries.

Senator McKELLAR. Does that include both board and lodging?

Mr. DODD. It would include board and lodging. In that case the nurses and others receiving subsistence would have an additional $180, or a total of $360 deducted from the gross salary, whatever that might be.

Senator McKELLAR. The people who live in the houses pay for the houses? For instance, the bungalow with four rooms and a bath? They do not get any food?

Mr. DODD. No, sir. They furnish their own food.

Senator McKELLAR. Those people who live in the houses furnish their own food?

Mr. DODD. Yes, sir.

Senator McKELLAR. Is that furnished by the Government at a reduced price?

Mr. DODD. No, sir. In some places they run a Government mess for the single employees, and the married families usually provide their own food in their own way. They may take their meals at the mess, paying for such meals out of their salaries.

Senator McKELLAR. But if they are single they can get it through the Government?

Mr. DODD. No, sir; They cannot. The mess is paid for by the employees and not by the Government.

Mr. SCATTERGOOD. I should like to say something in regard to another item Mrs. Crawford mentioned.

Senator McKELLAR. Before we leave this other point, I want to ask the gentlemen about these houses. Who buys these houses? Are they bought at the expense of the Government or at the expense of the Indians?

Mr. SCATTERGOOD. They were built at the expense of the tribal fund of the Indians.

Senator McKELLAR. It seems to me there are a good many of them there.

Mr. SCATTERGOOD. Yes, sir. There were some very large timber operations there.

Senator McKELLAR. Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask that the reporter insert in the record at this point the portion I have marked, beginning on page 611 of the hearings before the House Committee on Appropriations for 1933.

Senator SMOOT. That may be done.

	Ford, coupe.....	March 1924.....	To be turned in on new car.

Mr. SCATTERGOOD. Of course, it must be realized that this Klamath Reservation, at the time when everything was busy, did a very large business—upward of a million dollars a year—in Indian royalties. I think one year there were $1,400,000 royalties for the Indians. There was a very large business turn-over, which required a large number of employees. With changed conditions, there is no such need for that number. There has been a considerable reduction, as I have stated.

[From hearings before subcommittee of House Committee on Appropriations on Interior Department appropriation bill for 1933, Seventy-second Congress, first session]

NUMBER OF EMPLOYEES ON PAY ROLL AS OF APRIL 1931

Mr. HASTINGS. If you have it in your mind, I should like for you to run over the number of employees at the agency. You can either do it offhand now or prepare a statement and put it in the record, submitting for our consideration just what employees on the agency should be eliminated. I should like to have that in succinct form.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I have the regular pay roll showing the list of employees and their salaries.

Mr. HASTINGS. You are going to put that in?

Mr. CRAWFORD. Yes, sir.

SENECA INDIAN SCHOOL, WYANDOTTE, OKLA.

The bill (S. 555) to authorize the acquisition by the United States of the land upon which the Seneca Indian School, Wyandotte, Okla., is located was announced as next in order.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I should like to have some explanation of this bill.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, this bill was passed at the last session of Congress, and the facts are as follows: Years ago the Indian Office located several schools in Oklahoma. Those schools were located upon the tribal lands of various tribes of Indians. At that time a school was located on the Wyandotte Reservation. Since that time pupils from other tribes have been admitted to the school, so it has ceased to be strictly a tribal school, but has now become a general Indian school.

The Government has erected numerous buildings on the land in question, but the land still belongs to the Seneca Tribe of Indians. The Department thinks that, inasmuch as the school is now a general school and the Government has expended perhaps $100,000 upon this private land, this is a good time for the Government to purchase the land from the tribe of Indians which owns it and make this a strictly Government school, both as to the buildings and the land. The department asks for an appropriation of $10,000 to buy the land upon which this general Indian school is located and is now conducted. That is the purpose of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to acquire for Indian school purposes, the east half southwest quarter, southeast quarter northwest quarter, east half northwest quarter and west half southwest quarter southeast quarter section 21, township 27 north, range 24 east, Indian meridian, Oklahoma.

SEC. 2. In order to carry out the provisions of section 1 hereof there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $10,000, which said sum when so appropriated and placed in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the Wyandotte Tribe of Indians, shall operate as a full, complete, and perfect extinguishment of all their right, title, and interest in and to the lands above described and which sum shall be subject to disbursement under congressional authority for the benefit of the Wyandotte Tribe.

MISSOURI RIVER BRIDGE, KANSAS

The bill (S. 1255) to extend the time for completing the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at or near Kansas City, Kans., was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MCGILL subsequently said: Mr. President, the Senate today passed Senate bill 1255 and House bill 48, both bills being to extend the time for completing the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at or near Kansas City, Kans., and the bills are duplicates. I ask unanimous consent that the votes whereby Senate bill 1255 was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, may be reconsidered, and that the bill may be indefinitely postponed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the bill will be indefinitely postponed.

MISSOURI RIVER BRIDGE, KANSAS

The bill (S. 1256) granting the consent of Congress to compacts or agreements between the States of Kansas and Missouri for the acquisition, maintenance, and operation of a toll bridge across the Missouri River near Kansas City, Kans., for the construction and maintenance of connections with established highways, for the incorporation of such bridge in the highway systems of said States, and for other purposes, was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to any agreements or compacts that have heretofore been or may hereafter be entered into by and between the State of Kansas, or the highway department or other public agency thereof, and the State of Missouri, or the highway department thereof, pursuant to statutes enacted or to be enacted or resolutions adopted or to be adopted by each of such States, providing:

(a) For the authorization of the construction of a toll bridge over the Missouri River between Wyandotte County, Kans., and Platte County, Mo., at or near Kansas City, Kans., by Regional Bridge Co. (successor and assignee of the Interstate Bridge Co.), and granting to such company all necessary lands under water belonging to the said States;

(b) For the transfer of such bridge to and acceptance of such bridge by such States, or the respective highway departments or other public agencies of such States, subject to any mortgage thereon and pledge of tolls previously executed by the Regional Bridge Co. to secure a loan for its construction;

(c) For the incorporation of said toll bridge in the highway systems of such States;

(d) For the construction and maintenance of approaches by such States, or the respective highway departments or other public agencies of such States, and of connections with established highways;

(e) For the regulation of tolls, maintenance, operation, insurance, policing, regulation of traffic over said bridge, and all matters relating thereto and for the financing of the construction thereof;

(f) For the prohibition against the construction or operation of any other bridge, ferry, tunnel, or other competing facility by such States, or any political subdivision thereof, or the granting by such States of any rights, privileges, or franchises, except such as are now constructed and in operation, within a distance of 5 miles in either direction from the location of the proposed toll bridge, measured along the meandering course of the Missouri River, so long as there shall remain unpaid any loan or any part thereof to secure which a mortgage on said bridge and a pledge of tolls therefrom had been executed; and

(g) For the continuance of said bridge as a free public bridge connecting and constituting a part of the highway systems of such States after the liquidation of the cost of construction and interest and other charges incident thereto from tolls collected.

SEC. 2. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That completes the calendar.

PROTECTION OF GOVERNMENT RECORDS

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I suggest that we now return to Order of Business 22, House bill 4220, for the protection of Government records.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON obtained the floor.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, before the Senator from California proceeds, I call attention to the fact that at the suggestion, I think, of the Senator from New Mexico, I had incorporated in the bill the word "and" before the words "shall willfully." I think that improves the language of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the engrossment of the amendment and the third reading of the bill.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator from California yield to me to suggest the absence of a quorum? This is an important matter, and Senators should be present.

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Connally	Hale	Metcalf
Ashurst	Coolidge	Harrison	Murphy
Austin	Copeland	Hastings	Norbeck
Bachman	Costigan	Hatfield	Norris

Thomas, Okla.	Trammell	Van Nuys	Wheeler
Thomas, Utah	Tydings	Wagner	White
Townsend	Vandenberg	Walcott

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-seven Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator from California yield to me?

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I understand the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] wishes to have another bill taken up at this time; and, for the convenience of some Senators who are interested in both measures, I suggest that we temporarily lay aside the pending bill and take up the securities bill for a time.

Mr. JOHNSON. I shall be very glad to have that done. That bill is a much more important measure, in my opinion, than the pending bill.

PROTECTION OF INVESTORS

Mr. FLETCHER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 875.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Florida, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of a bill, the title of which will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A bill (S. 875) to provide for the furnishing of information and the supervision of traffic in investment securities in interstate commerce.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I inquire if the motion is to proceed to the consideration of the Senate bill or the House bill?

Mr. FLETCHER. I have moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Senate bill.

Mr. McNARY. I will say to the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] that the Senator from Florida has moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Senate bill. The Senator from Michigan expressed to me and others this morning a desire to have the House bill referred to the committee. Has an agreement been reached with regard to that matter?

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, the Senator from Florida and I discussed the matter, and it seemed to be the consensus of opinion that we ought to go on and discuss the Senate bill, so as to ascertain, if possible, what the differences are between the House bill and the Senate bill. So far as I am concerned, I am in agreement with the plan of going ahead with the securities bill.

Mr. FLETCHER. In any case, I may say to the Senator that the bill will have to go to conference, and my view is that we can proceed with the Senate bill and pass it, if we may, and then substitute it for the House bill. That will throw the whole subject into conference. It will have to be thrashed out by the conferees, anyway, and I think that is the best method of procedure. The conferees will then be able to adjust the differences between the House and the Senate. If we should now refer the House bill to the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency, that would lead to considerable delay, and I do not know that we could get any closer together by that method than we can in conference, anyway. So, as a matter of practical procedure and in order to make progress, I think we should take up the Senate bill, which I believe we can pass without taking a great deal of time on it. Then the Senate bill can be substituted for the House bill and the measure then go to conference in all its details. I believe we can proceed without any loss of time in that way.

We would not save any time by referring the House bill to the Senate committee, which has already considered the whole subject, held hearings on it extending over weeks, and reported this bill. I think there are not a great many differences between the two bills. I may say that in principle and in purpose the bills are the same. There is a different use of language in one as compared to the other, but I do not think there is any very serious difference. So I think we had better proceed with the Senate bill and dispose of it, if we may.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Florida to proceed to the consideration of the bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 875) to provide for the furnishing of information and the supervision of stocks and investment securities in interstate commerce, which had been reported from the Committee on Banking and Currency with an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will state the amendment reported by the committee.

The legislative clerk proceeded to read the amendment reported by the Committee on Banking and Currency, which was to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

That this act shall be known as the "Securities Act."

SEC. 2. When used in this act the following terms shall, unless the text otherwise indicates, include the following respective meanings:

(a) "Security" shall include any note, stock, bond, debenture, evidence of indebtedness, certificate of interest or participation in a profit-sharing agreement, or right to subscribe to any of the foregoing, any certificate of interest in any oil, gas, or mining lease, any collateral trust certificate, preorganization certificate, or preorganization subscription, any transferable share, investment contract, voting trust certificate, or beneficial interest in title to property, profits, or earnings, any transferable certificate of voting, exchange, subscription, or conversion rights, or any other instrument commonly known as "a security"; including an interim or temporary bond, debenture, note, certificate, or receipt for a security or for subscription to a security: Provided, That the term "security" shall not include notes, drafts, bills of exchange, or bankers' acceptances which are commercial paper and arise out of current commercial, agricultural, or industrial transactions or the proceeds of which have been or are to be used for current commercial, agricultural, or industrial purposes when such paper is not offered or intended to be offered for sale to the public.

(b) "Person" shall include a natural person, a corporation, a partnership, an association, a joint-stock company, a trust, a syndicate, and any unincorporated organization. As used herein the term "trust" shall not include a trust created or appointed under or by virtue of a last will and testament, or by a court of law or equity, or any public charitable trust.

For the purpose of the enforcement of this act only, any security given or delivered with, or as a bonus on account of, any purchase of securities or any other thing, shall be conclusively presumed to constitute a part of the subject of such purchase. "Sale" or "sell" shall also include a contract to sell, an exchange, an attempt to sell or exchange, an option of sale, purchase, or exchange, a solicitation of a sale or an exchange, a subscription or an offer to sell or exchange, directly or by an agent, or by a circular, letter, advertisement, or otherwise.

(d) "Issuer" shall include every person who issues, has issued, or proposes to issue any security. Any person who acts as a promoter for and on behalf of an individual, corporation, trust, or unincorporated association or partnership of any kind formed or to be formed shall also be deemed to be an issuer.

(j) "Underwriter" or "underwriting syndicate", when used with respect to any security, shall include any person, group, or syndicate which has purchased or underwritten or contracted to purchase or underwrite such security, directly or indirectly, from the issuer, or has contracted to act as selling agent for the issuer or assigns, for the purpose of offering for sale or selling or promoting the marketing of such security or any part thereof.

(k) "Dummy" shall mean a person who holds legal or nominal title to any property but is under moral or legal obligation to recognize another as the owner thereof; or a person who has nominal power or authority to act in any capacity but is under moral or legal obligation to act therein in accordance with the direction of another.

SEC. 3. Until securities shall have been registered with the Commission by filing the registration statement hereinafter referred to in accordance with the terms and conditions provided by this act and by the rules and regulations promulgated pursuant thereto, or if such registration has been revoked or suspended as hereinafter provided, it shall be unlawful for—

(a) Any person to make use of the United States mails to sell or offer for sale any such securities in interstate commerce, or to solicit or accept offers to buy such securities in such commerce;

(b) Or for any person to advertise for sale or offer to sell or to solicit or accept an offer to buy any such securities in interstate commerce through the use or medium of any book, magazine, newspaper, or similar publication, or by any circular, advertisement, or printed, written, or other graphic communication or document, or by any spoken communication carried or transmitted through or by such mails or by radio, telegraph, or telephone, or by other means or instruments of transportation or communication, or any of them;

(d) Or for any person to sell or offer for sale or to announce or advertise or deliver in the United States any such securities when the same are securities of a foreign government or a political subdivision thereof.

SEC. 4. All securities heretofore referred to in section 3 of this act shall be registered with the Commission under the terms and conditions hereinafter provided, by filing a registration statement signed by the issuer or issuers, its or their principal executive officer or officers, the principal financial officer or officers, and the directors, trustees, or managers; or, if there is no board of directors, by the persons or board having the power of management of the person, corporation, association, or other entity issuing the said securities: Provided, That, when such statement relates to securities issued by a foreign government or political subdivision thereof, or by any person residing in or by any corporation or association organized under the laws of any foreign country, it shall be signed by the person or persons negotiating the loan in the United States or Territory or acting as the fiscal or selling agent for the sale of such security in the United States or Territory or underwriting such security for sale in the United States or Territory, and by the principal executive officers, principal financial officers, and the directors or other managing officials of such person or persons.

Signatures of all such persons when printed on the said statements shall be presumed to be so printed by authority of the person whose signature is so affixed, and the burden of proof, in the event such authority shall be denied, shall be upon the party denying same. If any signer of any registration statement shall act therein as a "dummy" he shall state after his signature that he signs as a "dummy" and shall state who such signer's principal or principals are. In the case of signature of any registration statement by one who is shown to be a "dummy" for another, such signature shall not be deemed to be valid for the purposes of this act unless and until the principal of the said "dummy" shall also affix his signature to the said statement. The affixing of any signature without the authority of the purported signer shall constitute a violation of this act. Similar statements shall be filed for each subsequent issue of securities, unless otherwise exempted by this act, not covered by the original and succeeding statements.

(e) At the time of filing the said statement, as hereinbefore prescribed in subsections (a) and (b) of this section, the applicant shall pay to the Commission a fee of one hundredth of 1 percent of the aggregate par value of the securities to be sold and for which the applicant is seeking registration, but in no case shall such fee be less than $25. In case of stock having no par value the price at which such stock is to be offered to the public shall be deemed to be the par value of such stock.

Sec. 6. The Commission may revoke or suspend the registration of any security by entering an order to that effect, if the Commission shall find that any such issuer or any other person who has signed or who is by this act required to sign the registration statement—

(a) Has violated any of the provisions of this act, or any authorized order of the Commission of which such person or issuer has notice, but the burden of proof shall be on the person or persons asserting lack of notice; or

(b) Has been or is engaged or is about to engage in fraudulent transactions, or has filed with the Commission any application, registration, or other statement, or report which is untrue in any material respect or fails to disclose any material information required by section 5 hereof; or

(c) Has made any fraudulent, false, or deceptive representations in any prospectus or in any circular or other literature or communication that has been distributed, or by any other means, concerning such issuer or person or securities registered. Such revocation or suspension shall not apply to any part of an issue of securities that prior to the date of such revocation or suspension shall have been issued, sold, and delivered to a bona fide purchaser or purchasers for value, without notice, such purchaser or purchasers not being the issuers or underwriters or their agents, representatives, or assigns.

The Commission is hereby directed and empowered to make such examinations and investigations as in its discretion it may deem necessary to the administration or enforcement of this act. In making such examinations or investigations the Commission or any officer or officers designated by it shall at all reasonable times have access to and may compel the production of all the books and papers of issuers, representatives, or underwriters, or any other person or persons being investigated or proceeded against, or having relevant or pertinent knowledge or information touching the matter in question, and may administer oaths to and examine the officers of such issuers, representatives, underwriters, or other persons connected therewith as to its or their business and affairs and, in addition, the Commission may, in its discretion, require the production of a balance sheet exhibiting the assets and liabilities of any issuer, representative, or underwriter, or its or their income statement, or both.

Whenever the Commission may deem it necessary, it may also require such balance sheet or income statement, or both, to be made more specific in such particulars as the Commission shall point out or to be brought down to the latest practicable date.

If any issuer, representative, underwriter, or other entity shall refuse to permit an examination to be made by the Commission, such refusal shall be proper ground for revocation or suspension of registration.

If the Commission shall deem it necessary, it may enter an order requiring an immediate showing of the right to sell securities, and upon failure of the person in whom such right has been reposed to make a satisfactory showing, and an order, entered to that effect, such right shall be suspended. Notice of the entry of such orders may be served by mail, or personally, or by telephone confirmed in writing, or by telegraph.

The issuer or other applicant for registration shall on application to the Commission within 30 days from the entry of an order of revocation or suspension be entitled to a public hearing, before the Commission or an examiner of the Commission thereunto duly authorized by it, and appropriate records shall be kept of all such hearings and proceedings. If the issuer or other person fails to make such application for a hearing within 30 days after the entry of the Commission's order, such order shall become final.

Sec. 7. Any person aggrieved by an order of the Commission revoking or suspending the registration of any security may obtain a review of such order in the circuit court of appeals of the United States, within any circuit wherein such person resides or carries on business, or in the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia, by filing in the court, within 30 days after such order shall become final, a written petition praying that the order of the Commission be set aside. A copy of such petition shall be forthwith served upon the Commission, and thereupon the Commission shall certify and file in the court a transcript of the record upon which the order complained of was entered. Any findings which the Commission may make as to the facts, if supported by evidence, shall be conclusive. Upon said transcript the court shall have the power to make and enter a decree affirming, modifying, or setting aside the order of the Commission. If either party shall apply to the court for leave to adduce additional evidence, and shall show to the satisfaction of the court that such additional evidence is material and that there were reasonable grounds for failure to adduce such evidence in the hearing before the Commission, the court may order such additional evidence to be taken before the Commission and to be adduced upon the hearing in such manner and upon such terms and conditions as to the court may seem proper. The Commission may modify its findings as to the fact, by reason of the additional evidence so taken, and it shall file such modified or new findings, which, if supported by the evidence, shall be conclusive, and its recommendation, if any, for the modification or setting aside of the original order, with the return of such additional evidence. The judgment and decree of the court shall be final, except that the same shall be subject to review by the Supreme Court upon certiorari or certification as provided in sections 240 and 343 of the Judicial Code, as amended.

Sec. 8. It shall be unlawful to carry, transmit, or cause to be carried or transmitted, in interstate commerce, by use of the United States mails or by any means or instruments of transportation or communication, any written, printed, or other graphic communication or document, or any radio communication, announcing, offering, or advertising for sale any securities subject to the provisions of this act, unless such communication or document contains the following information concerning the security so offered:

(a) The name of the issuer and names of the underwriting syndicate, if any, amount of capitalization authorized and paid up, location of principal place of business, and, if incorporated, place of incorporation.

(b) A brief description of the security offered, including the amount of the issue, a description of its rights with reference to dividends or fixed returns and voting power and relative position with reference to other outstanding securities having prior rights which must be specified as well as the amount of capital stock and other securities, commissions, discounts, rebates, and bonuses.

(c) The price at which it is offered to the public and the net amount to be returned to capital investment, as well as the maximum amount of commission or other form of remuneration to be paid in cash or otherwise, directly or indirectly, for or in connection with the sale or offering for sale of such securities.

(d) The owner of the property constituting the basis of the issue.

(e) A statement showing—

(1) The issuer's assets and liabilities.

(2) Profits and losses during year immediately preceding the offering.

(f) A statement to the effect that additional information may be secured from the Federal Trade Commission at Washington, D.C.: Provided, That in any case where, by reason of limited size of such written, printed, or other graphic or radio communications, it is impracticable to set forth all the foregoing information, there shall be set forth such parts thereof or such other information as the Commission may by rules or regulations prescribe in the interest of the protection of the public and for the prevention of false or deceptive representations in the offer for sale or sale of such securities in interstate commerce or by use of the mails: Provided further, That any written, printed, or other graphic communication or document, or any radio communication, announcing, offering, or advertising for sale any securities offered by a foreign government or political subdivision thereof shall contain such information of the character referred to in the registration statement, or such additional information, as the Commission may prescribe by rules or regulations in the interest of the protection of the public and for the prevention of false or deceptive representations in the offer for sale or sale of such securities in interstate commerce or by use of the mails.

The information referred to in this section, when written, printed, or otherwise graphically expressed, shall be placed in a conspicuous part of all communications, documents, or other literature describing or mentioning the securities advertised or offered for sale. Copies of all such written or printed or other graphic communications or documents, as well as transcripts of all radio advertising, referring to the sale of securities subject to the provisions of this section shall, before distribution of such communications to prospective purchasers is begun, be filed with the Commission together with a reference to the original registration of the securities so offered.

A statement containing the information required by this section shall also be delivered to each purchaser with the delivery of the security or securities to which it relates, whenever the security is sold by the issuer, or by his or its agents or representatives.

The information required under the provisions of this act contained in all registration or other statements, copies, prospectuses, advertisements, circular letters, and communications, and other documents shall be made available to the public under such regulations as the Commission may prescribe.

Sec. 9. Every person acquiring any securities specified in such statement and offered to the public shall be presumed to rely upon the representations set forth in the said statement. In case any such registration statement shall be false or deceptive in any material respect, any persons acquiring any securities to which such statement relates, either from the original issuer or from any other person, shall have the right to rescind the transaction and to obtain the return, either at law or in equity, of any and all consideration given or paid for any such securities upon the surrender thereof, either from any vendor knowing of such falsity or from the persons signing such statement, jointly or severally. Every person acquiring any security by reason of any false or deceptive representation made in the course of or in connection with a sale or an offer for sale or distribution of such securities shall have the right to recover any and all damages suffered by reason of such acquisition of such securities from the person or persons signing, issuing, using, or causing, directly or indirectly, such false or deceptive representation, jointly or severally: Provided, That any suit, action, or proceeding under this section against a corporation or other person may be brought not only in the judicial district whereof such corporation or person is an inhabitant, but also in any district wherein such corporation or person may be found or transacts business, and without respect to the amount in controversy; but no such suit, action, or proceeding shall be brought after the expiration of 5 years after the date of the sale by the issuer or underwriter, except that in the case of a false or deceptive representation made in the course of or in connection with a sale or offer for sale or distribution of such securities, such suit, action, or proceeding shall not be brought after the expiration of 5 years after the date such false or deceptive representation was made. All process in such suits, actions, or proceedings may be served in the district whereof such corporation or person is an inhabitant or wherever such corporation or person may be found. Any condition, stipulation, or provision binding any person acquiring any of the securities offered to the public to waive compliance with any of the provisions of this act, or of the rules and regulations, or of any requirement of the Commission herein provided for, or purporting to affect such person with notice of any contract, document, or matter not specifically referred to in the statement filed with respect to such securities as herein provided, shall be void. The rights and remedies herein provided for shall be in addition to any and all other rights and remedies that may exist at law or in equity.

Sec. 10. It shall be unlawful for any person to represent or cause to be represented to any prospective purchaser, either orally or in any written or printed communication, circular, advertisement, or other literature, that either registration of securities with the Commission or omission by the Commission to revoke or suspend said registration constitutes or is evidence of the Commission's approval or recommendation of such securities.

Sec. 11. Except as hereinafter otherwise expressly provided, the provisions of this act shall not apply to any of the following classes of securities:

(a) Any security issued or guaranteed by the United States or any Territory or insular possession thereof, or by the District of Columbia, or by any State of the United States or political subdivision or agency or instrumentality of any State or States.

(b) Any security issued by and representing an interest in or a direct obligation of any common carrier or other public utility subject to regulation or supervision as to the issue of its securities or its accounts by a commission, board, or officers of the Government of the United States; or any such security issued by any national bank; or by any corporation created and controlled by and acting as an instrumentality of the Government of the United States pursuant to authority granted by the Congress of the United States: Provided, That nothing in this act shall relieve any of the organizations mentioned in this subsection from submitting to the respective supervisory units of the Government of the United States, in such manner and form as may be required by the respective units, all information, reports, or other documents that are required under the provisions of section 5 of this act, and such additional information, reports, and documents as are now or may hereafter be required by other acts of Congress or by rules and regulations pursuant thereto of the respective units: And provided further, That all such organizations mentioned in this subsection shall nevertheless be required to comply with the provisions of section 8 of this act.

(c) Any security issued by a corporation organized exclusively for religious, educational, benevolent, fraternal, charitable, or reformatory purposes and not for pecuniary profit, and no part of the net earnings of which inures to the benefit of any person, private stockholder, or individual.

(d) Bonds or notes secured by mortgage upon real estate, improved or about to be improved by a residential structure, when the total encumbrances against any single property so mortgaged, including the mortgage securing the bonds and notes exempted by this paragraph, do not exceed $50,000.

(e) Any security issued by a building and loan association, cooperative bank, homestead association, or savings and loan association, or any annuity contract or optional annuity contract issued by a corporation and payable in instalments: Provided, That the foregoing exemption shall not apply with respect to any security or annuity or optional annuity contract issued by any such association, cooperative bank, or corporation which charges in connection with any transaction entrance, admission, or withdrawal fees (including charges for paid-in surplus) exceeding in the aggregate 2 percent of the par value of its securities involved in such transaction, or which sells its securities at a price in excess of their par value, or which issues surplus certificates or like instruments of any kind.

(f) Any securities issued, sold, and delivered to any bona fide purchaser or purchasers, not being the underwriter, selling agent, representative, or assign of the issuer, prior to the date of the approval of this act: Provided, That this exemption shall not apply in the case of a sale or offer for sale, by an owner or dealer, through any prospectus, circular, pamphlet, or other advertising medium, of such securities having an aggregate par value (or, if they have no par value, an aggregate stated or assigned value) of more than $100,000, and whether such sale or offer for sale is made as one transaction or a series of transactions, except that in any such case the registration statement required under this act shall consist of a statement signed by the owner (or, in the case of a sale or offer for sale by a dealer, by the owner and the dealer) containing a copy of such prospectus, circular, pamphlet, or other advertisement, together with the name of the legal and beneficial owners of such securities, and such information affecting or relating to the value of such securities as the Commission may require in the interest of the protection of the public.

(g) Any security issued by or representing an interest in or a direct obligation of any Federal Reserve bank.

SEC. 12. Except as hereinafter otherwise expressly provided, the provisions of this act shall not apply to any of the following transactions:

(a) Judicial, executor's, administrator's, guardian's, or conservator's sale, or any sale by a receiver or trustee in insolvency or bankruptcy.

(b) Sales by or for the account of a pledge holder or mortgagee selling or offering for sale or delivery in the ordinary course of business and not for the purpose of avoiding the provisions of this act, to liquidate a bona fide debt, a security pledged in good faith as collateral for such debt.

(c) Isolated transactions in which any security issued subsequent to the date of approval of this act is sold, or offered for sale, subscription, or delivery by the owner thereof, or by his representative solely for the owner's account, such sale or offer for sale, subscription, or delivery not being made in the course of repeated and successive transactions of a like character by such owner for the purpose of engaging in the purchase and sale of securities as a business, such owner or representative not being the issuer or underwriter of, or selling agent for, such security.

(d) Any preliminary negotiations between the issuers, underwriters, or other persons necessary to preparing an issue of securities for registration under this act or for sale to the public after registration.

SEC. 13. It shall be unlawful for any person, firm, corporation, or other entity, directly or indirectly, in any interstate sale, promotion, negotiation, advertisement, or distribution of any securities willfully to employ any device, scheme, or artifice or to employ any "dummy", or to act as any such "dummy", with the intent to defraud or to obtain money or property by means of any false pretense, representation, or promise, or to engage in any transaction, practice, or course of business relating to the interstate purchase or sale of any securities which operates or would operate as a fraud upon the purchaser. The director or other person for whom any "dummy" shall act shall be held responsible under this act for any unlawful conduct by such "dummy": Provided, That the said "dummy" shall not be deemed discharged from any liability for any unlawful conduct under this act. It shall be unlawful for any person who is a "dummy" for another to sign a registration statement without disclosing his principal or principals.

Whenever it shall appear to the Commission, either upon complaint or otherwise, that the provisions of this section have been or are about to be violated, it may, in its discretion, either require or permit such person, firm, corporation, association, or other entity to file with it a statement in writing, under oath, or otherwise, as to all the facts and circumstances concerning the subject matter which it believes to be in the public interest to investigate, and may investigate such facts. Whenever it shall appear to the Commission that the practices investigated constitute a fraud or an attempt to defraud under the provisions of this section, or that any person is engaged or is about to engage in interstate commerce in securities without complying with the provisions of this act and the rules and regulations promulgated by the Commission pursuant thereto, or in violation of any such provisions, rules, or regulations, the Commission may, in its discretion, bring an action in the proper district court of the United States to enjoin such practices, transactions, or violations, which injunction upon a proper showing shall be granted without bond, and the Commission shall transmit such evidence as may be available concerning the transaction or facts complained of to the Attorney General, who may, in his discretion, institute the necessary criminal proceeding under section 16 of this act. The exemptions contained in sections 11 and 12 of this act shall not apply to the provisions of this section.

SEC. 14. (a) The Commission shall have authority, from time to time, to make, amend, and rescind rules and regulations for the purpose of executing this act. It shall have authority to prescribe forms upon which all statements to be filed as hereinbefore provided shall be made, and to require such further or supplemental data or information as it may deem proper in the public interest to be included in or from time to time filed in conjunction with the said statements. Such rules and regulations shall be effective upon publication in the manner which the Commission shall prescribe.

(b) For the purpose of all investigations or inquiries which, in the opinion of the Commission, are necessary and proper for the enforcement of this act, the Commission and any officer or officers designated by it are empowered to hold hearings, receive evidence, and subpoena witnesses, examine them under oath and require the production of any books, papers, or other documents which the Commission deems relevant or material to the investigation or inquiry. Such attendance of witnesses, and the production of such documentary evidence, may be required from any place in the United States or any Territory at any designated place of hearing.

SEC. 15. The district courts of the United States, the district courts of Alaska, Hawaii, Puerto Rico, Canal Zone, and the Virgin Islands, and the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, shall have jurisdiction of offenses and violations under this act and under the rules and regulations promulgated by the Commission in respect thereto; and of all suits in equity and actions at law brought under this act. Judgments and decrees so rendered shall be subject to review as provided in sections 128 and 240 of the Judicial Code, as amended (U.S.C., title 28, secs. 225 and 345).

In case of contumacy or refusal to obey a subpoena issued to any corporation or other person, any of the courts heretofore named in this section within the jurisdiction of which the corporation or other person guilty of contumacy or refusal to obey resides or carries on business may issue an order requiring such corporation or other person to appear before the Commission, or one of its examiners designated by it, there to produce documentary evidence if so ordered, or there to give evidence touching the matter in question; and any failure to obey any such order of the court may be punished by said court as a contempt thereof.

Upon application of the Attorney General of the United States, at the request of the Commission, the said courts shall have jurisdiction to issue writs of mandamus commanding any person or corporation to comply with the provisions of this act or any order of the Commission made in pursuance thereof.

SEC. 16. Any person who shall willfully violate any of the provisions of this act, or the rules and regulations promulgated by the Commission pursuant thereto, shall, upon conviction, be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than 5 years, or both; and any officer, director, or agent or any corporation who knowingly participates in such violation shall be punished by a like fine or imprisonment, or both.

SEC. 17. The necessary appropriations for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act are hereby authorized. All moneys derived from the fees imposed by the provisions of this act shall be paid into the Treasury to the credit of miscellaneous receipts.

SEC. 18. If any provisions of this act, or the application of such provision to any person or circumstance, shall be held invalid, the remainder of this act, or the application of such provisions to persons or circumstances other than those as to which it is held invalid, shall not be affected thereby.

SEC. 19. This act shall take effect 90 days after its approval.

During the reading of the amendment,

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, the clerk is reading the entire amendment, which is a substitute for the original bill. It seems to me that we cannot legislate simply by reading the bill. I suggest that the chairman of the committee explain to the Senate just what the bill contemplates and what each paragraph means. We will have no chance to amend it, as it is all one amendment, if we agree to the amendment. The matter will then be closed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment is open to amendment.

Mr. FLETCHER. The amendment itself is open to amendment.

Mr. COUZENS. Yes; but if there is no explanation, we cannot understand the bill by hearing it read through as the clerk is reading it.

Mr. FLETCHER. As I understand the rule, we have to read the bill unless consent is granted to dispense with the reading. I am willing to ask unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill may be dispensed with.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the formal reading of the bill is dispensed with. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. FLETCHER. In a general way, Mr. President, I need not say, for Senators are familiar with the conditions, that for some years past there have been offered to the public various securities, foreign and domestic, by various concerns, corporations, organizations, and what not. Such securities have been disposed of to the public in a loose and haphazard sort of way. Bankers, brokers, syndicates, and financial institutions have been handling them, and super-powered agents have been selling them. People have been persuaded to invest their money in securities without any information respecting them, except the advertisements put forth by the agents or representatives of those issuing the securities, and such advertisements have not given full information to the public. The result was that we had a saturnalia of speculation throughout the country, almost as far back as 1920, and certainly during 1927, 1928, 1929, and 1930. People were persuaded to put their money into these investments sometimes because they were attracted by the high rates of interest and often because they were told that the price of the securities would go up and they would make money easily and rapidly by investing in them.

Some persons, under some circumstances, have been persuaded to dispose of perfectly good securities and invest in worthless securities which were offered to them by agents all over the country. There are instances which were brought out by the testimony before the committee where widows who owned Liberty bonds, having invested the accumulations of a lifetime in such bonds, were persuaded by some of these agents to sell their bonds and invest their all in valueless securities by all sorts of misrepresentations, such as that they were bound to increase in value, that returns would be considerable, and all that sort of thing. There are instances where persons who had savings deposits were inveigled into withdrawing those deposits and investing in worthless securities. It is estimated that something like $90,000,000,000 in the hands of people have during recent years been invested in such securities, most of which have become practically worthless.

The idea is that, in the first place, these securities move in interstate commerce. It is therefore, on the commerce clause of the Constitution that we base our jurisdiction with respect to this proposed legislation. The securities also move in the mails, and it is under the postal laws of the country that Congress has further jurisdiction to legislate in this connection. Acting under those two provisions of the Constitution, we have undertaken to impose certain restrictions and to provide certain regulations in reference to securities that are being offered to the public throughout the country from time to time.

We have no Federal legislation covering this situation, and so, in order to protect the public and in order to protect investors, this bill has been devised. We gave lengthy hearings on it, hearings extending over weeks, and finally reached the conclusion to amend, in many respects, the original bill that had been introduced; in fact, in so many respects that we reported a new bill as a substitute for the original bill.

The purpose of the bill is to protect the investing public and honest business. The basic policy is that of informing the investor of the facts concerning securities to be offered for sale in interstate and foreign commerce and providing protection against fraud and misrepresentation. That is the general purpose of the bill. The aim is to prevent further exploitation of the public by the sale of unsound, fraudulent, and worthless securities through misrepresentation; to place adequate and true information before the investors; to protect honest enterprise, seeking capital by honest presentation, against the competition afforded by questionable securities offered to the public through crooked promotion; to restore the confidence of the prospective investor in sound securities; to bring into productive channels of industry and development capital which has grown timid to the point of hoarding; and to aid in providing employment and in restoring buying and consuming power. Those are the general purposes of the bill, and we have endeavored to write a piece of proposed legislation which will bring about that result.

There is need for such legislation. The President in his special message called attention to such need and pointed out the demand for this kind of legislation. The President said:

I recommend to the Congress legislation for Federal supervision of traffic in investment securities in interstate commerce.

In spite of many State statutes the public in the past has sustained severe losses through practices neither ethical nor honest on the part of many persons and corporations selling securities.

Of course, the Federal Government cannot and should not take any action which might be construed as approving or guaranteeing that newly issued securities are sound in the sense that their value will be maintained or that the properties which they represent will earn profit.

We have endeavored to accomplish all those purposes. It is expressly provided in the bill that the Government shall not be responsible as to guaranteeing the value of the securities offered. We provide, in the first place, for registration. Any concern, corporation or what not, desiring to issue securities must register with the Federal Trade Commission and furnish facts with reference to the securities offered. An inquiry is made by the Federal Trade Commission, and then, after the registration takes place, they are authorized to issue the securities, without the Government guaranteeing their value at all, but with the requirement that information shall be furnished to the public generally as to the character of what is offered and what is back of it.

That is the prime purpose of the first portion of the bill. There are other provisions with reference to punishment for fraud and with reference to the civil liability of those who issue securities. One of the chief differences, I think, between the House bill and the Senate bill is that the House bill rather limits this liability and makes a corporation and its directors, or what not, applying for the registration of securities, seeking the authorization of the Commission, liable civilly for any damage or loss that may arise by reason of misrepresentation or lack or omission as to representation with respect to the securities and the facts. The House bill, as I recall, limits the liability to those who have not acted in good faith; in other words, it provides that people signing the application for registration and obtaining the registration document shall not be liable if they act in good faith upon reasonable judgment and information.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President—

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WHEELER. Will the Senator tell me, if he can, how this measure will change or modify in any way the present laws upon the statute books with reference to using the mails to defraud?

Mr. FLETCHER. It seeks to apply those laws to the conditions which may arise hereafter.

Mr. WHEELER. I was going to say to the Senator that we have, of course, upon the statute books at the present time a provision preventing the use of the mails to defraud. Practically every single one of the fraudulent transactions involving the sale of worthless stocks or worthless bonds could have been prosecuted heretofore under the law which is on the statute books today. In other words, those issuing securities do not have to make misrepresentation in writing in order to come under the provisions of the present law. If salesmen go out at the present time and make misrepresentations to someone and then send the securities through the mail or send anything else through the mail, they can be prosecuted for using the mails or for conspiracy to use the mails to defraud.

One of the difficulties, it seems to me, is that we have not enforced the laws that are already upon the statute books relating to these matters. The Department of Justice has been absolutely derelict in its duty in connection with these fraudulent transactions and fraudulent security sales. It seems to me there ought to be, by the present Department of Justice, some vigorous prosecutions on a large scale for using the mails to defraud in many of these cases, not only by the promoters of the organizations, but likewise of some of the bankers who knew the condition of the bonds when they sold them. In my humble judgment, if a few outstanding cases were prosecuted by the Department of Justice, by the present Attorney General, it would do more to stop that sort of practice than all the legislation we could enact upon the subject. The trouble is we do not get any prosecution in these matters.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I think there is a great deal in what the Senator from Montana has said. Under the provisions of the bill we do not in anywise restrict or limit or weaken the laws already on the statute books. We are trying to cover instances where there seem to be loopholes and means of escape, and to apply the measure particularly to the matter of dealing in securities. Of course, a great deal of fraud has been committed, not entirely through the use of the mails, but by the agents going out over the country and making oral representations with respect to securities. A practice has been to put these agents through a sort of school and teach them how to sell securities, what to say, how to approach and what to say to prospective purchasers. This was done by underwriters' syndicate managers in order to reach the public.

Mr. WHEELER. I have had occasion to prosecute cases of that identical character where special agents went out and made false representations and then the bonds were sent through the mails. That furnishes a basis upon which United States district attorneys in the various States can prosecute at the present time. So far as I know they have not taken any of the outstanding cases, but have used the law that is upon the statute books to prosecute some little insignificant promoter of some mining stock. In one instance they picked out Dr. Cook, who sold some oil stock or something of that kind. However, the United States district attorneys have not picked out any of the men who have been carrying on these matters on a gigantic scale. If they would make an example of two or three of those outstanding cases they would do more to stop that sort of business than anything else I know of.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I have no doubt there is much in what the Senator said. It would have a very wholesome effect if there were prosecutions such as he indicates. The bill rather strengthens and broadens the authority to proceed in such instances. I think it would be helpful in that connection.

I do not wish to take the time of the Senate in relating the circumstances and conditions which have been obtaining, how the people have been defrauded, and why we ought to legislate so as to protect the public and the investors. That is the purpose of the bill. We could give instances without number of frauds that have been perpetrated. We could give instances of foreign securities that have been sold in this country which ought never to have been permitted to be sold here at all. We have tried to reach that situation, not through operations on foreign governments but through operations upon the agents representing such securities. I think we have fairly well taken care of that situation.

I hope we may proceed with the bill.

MUSCLE SHOALS

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I want to take the time of the Senate for a few moments to discuss a matter not directly connected with the measure now before the Senate.

In the course of the debate on the so-called "Muscle Shoals bill" and particularly with relation to one of the amendments offered by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], and more recently in the newspapers, a great deal was said about the widow and the orphan who own stock in corporations which own transmission lines and how we are going to ruin them by the passage of the Senate bill. Right now while the bill is in conference between the House and the Senate, a Power Trust propaganda is being carried on, not only by men who are here visiting Washington and buttonholing Senators and Representatives but by Power Trust newspapers. I want to read an editorial from the Birmingham News, and then I am going to answer the editorial and show how false it is. The heading of the editorial is—

The adjustment of differences between the Hill and Norris bills.

The editorial itself reads as follows:

Now that the Tennessee Valley legislation will go to conference committee to iron out the differences between the Hill bill passed by the House and the Norris bill passed by the Senate, definite action on Muscle Shoals seems certain after many years of delay. The differences between the two measures are of large importance to Alabama for many reasons, not the least of which lies in the interests of the thousands of holders of preferred stocks of the Alabama Power Co., and the thousands more who are policyholders in insurance companies or depositors in savings banks having heavy investments in the company's bonds.

Just remember that is point no. 1 that is made by the editorial—

The Alabama delegation in the House, led by Representative HILL, made a gallant fight for the bill as finally passed by that body. Senator BANKHEAD made an equally gallant but less successful fight in the Senate to obtain the concurrence of that body to those provisions of the House bill which required that efforts to make satisfactory contracts for the sale of power be exhausted before Government construction of transmission lines shall be undertaken.

The position assumed by the Alabama representatives in the House and Senate is essentially sound and fair, in the interest of the people as a whole and particularly of the people of the Muscle Shoals district.

Section 13 of the Hill bill declares, in language taken verbatim from the New York power authority act, the Roosevelt policy in that State: "That the project herein provided for shall be considered primarily as for the benefit of the people of the section as a whole and particularly the domestic and rural consumers to whom the power can economically be made available, and accordingly that sale to and use by industry shall be a secondary purpose, to be utilized principally to secure a sufficiently high load factor and revenue returns which will permit domestic and rural use of electricity."

That is something that the Senate bill does not for a single moment seek to destroy or take away, but it carries it out, I think, in the most effective manner that has been proposed. Yet the implication is that the Senate bill would take away from home owners the right to use electricity that would come from the Government-owned dam.

The editorial continues:

The adoption of this principle would mean that industry would carry a large part of the burden and that the balance of available power would be turned over to domestic and rural consumers at much lower rates than if no power were to be used locally at Muscle Shoals.

There are thousands of patriotic citizens of Alabama who will hope earnestly that in the conference committee report the principles so ably advocated by Representative HILL and Senator BANKHEAD, principles directly in line with President Roosevelt's campaign speeches, his actions as Governor of New York, and the statements made by him in his book recently published, will be permitted to govern.

While the matter was before the Senate I said on the floor that I would be willing to resign at once from the Senate if the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] would bring here a statement from President Roosevelt that he favored the Bankhead amendment. That offer is good yet. I want to assert that it cannot be done. I want to assert that these intimations that President Roosevelt wants the House bill passed are untrue.

When we were discussing transmission lines I said that the Senate bill authorizes the corporation to lease transmission lines, to buy transmission lines of the private companies, to purchase transmission lines, and to build transmission lines. It provides that the corporation may lease to private companies the transmission lines which they build, if they can do so. But the advocates of the House bill did not have enough friends in the Senate when the transmission amendment was about to be voted on even to get a roll call. The matter was practically unanimous.

The House bill provides that before the Government corporation can build a foot of transmission line it must first negotiate with private companies to build transmission lines. I called attention to what that would mean. I called attention to the fact that it would mean there would be no transmission lines built by the Government except at the end of lawsuits which would be carried to the Supreme Court of the United States. Under the terms of the House bill, Uncle Sam must first go to the Power Trust and negotiate. Uncle Sam, with his hands tied by law if the Congress should enact the House bill, must go on bended knees to the Power Trust and say, "For God's sake let me build transmission lines. Let me connect the Government's generating plant at Muscle Shoals with the other Government generating plant at Cove Creek."

Uncle Sam would plead on his knees to the Power Trust with his manacled hands upraised, and say, "I have to talk with you first before I can build this line." Uncle Sam would say, "I own a generating system at Muscle Shoals. I own a generating system at Cove Creek Dam. Let me connect them with a transmission line; will you, Mr. Power Trust?" The Power Trust would say, "Why, Uncle Sam, I will negotiate with you. I will have to take it up with my subsidiaries. I will take it up with the Alabama Power Co. I will take it up with the Tennessee Power Co. I will take it up with the Georgia Power Co. I will take it up in Wall Street with the Electric Bond & Share Co. I will take it up with Mr. Insull and his companies; and when I get through negotiating with you, maybe we can reach an agreement."

If Uncle Sam says, "No; I cannot wait. I need this power down there at Cove Creek to build the dam. It is going to waste at Muscle Shoals. I want a transmission line at once, in order that I may do that," and he starts to build it, the Power Trust will commence an injunction suit in the Federal court. The Power Trust have not a good case; I concede that; but they can make a mighty good one on paper. This corporation will allege on paper that Uncle Sam has not negotiated as the law requires. They will say, further, "He is taking away our property by building a line that lessens the value of our line, and under the fifth amendment to the Constitution that is taking away property without just compensation and without due process of law." They will get an injunction on those grounds, and they will go to the Supreme Court. Perhaps they will get beaten all the way, but in the end Cove Creek dam will have been built; 2 or 3 years will have passed, and this governmental corporation will have been compelled to buy electric power of the Power Trust to build Cove Creek Dam when it has more than it needs going to waste, getting nothing for it, at Muscle Shoals.

That is what will happen. That is what I said would happen. I am not an engineer, however, and I am going to read you some expert evidence on this subject. It did not come from me. It came from an engineer whose services were utilized by the House Military Affairs Committee in framing this bill. He was advised with by the chairman of the House committee. He wrote a letter to the chairman of the House committee. He sent me a copy of the letter, so I received the letter from the man who wrote it.

The letterhead reads as follows:

J. EDWARD CASSIDY, M.Am.Soc. C.E.,
CONSULTING ENGINEER,
1300 Vermont Avenue, NW., Washington, D.C., May 7, 1933.

That was yesterday.

Hon. J. J. McSWAIN,
Chairman House Military Affairs Committee,
Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR MR. McSWAIN: In the coming conference between the House and Senate on the subject of Muscle Shoals there is a most vital factor which must receive careful consideration, and that is the matter of transmission lines.

This is an engineer talking.

I have previously pointed out that a connecting transmission line between Muscle Shoals and Cove Creek is not only essential but it is vital—this line in reality being a long bus-bar between the two dams. This transmission line is as much a part of the two generating units as the concrete which is in the dams.

That is what this engineer says. That is what the Power Trust does not want. That is what we cannot get if we pass the House bill.

Reading further:

There is not another power project in the world where the peculiar relationship that exists between Cove Creek and Muscle Shoals is found, and it is the interdependence which places a special necessity on this line.

It does not take an engineer to see that necessity. No private party, no municipality, no one on earth would be so silly as to build two generating plants within transmission distance of each other and not connect them with a wire.

I read on:

The construction of this line is mandatory—

Says this engineer—

under the Senate amendments—

Let me read that again:

The construction of this line is mandatory under the Senate amendments, and to practical intents is eliminated in the House bill.

The House bill provides for its building, but it circumscribes it with the various technicalities that I have heretofore outlined.

Let me read further from this engineer's letter:

The Tennessee Power Co. in the April hearings—

This meets another point made in this editorial:

The Tennessee Power Co. in the April hearings strongly opposed the construction of this line, expressing a desire to enter into working arrangements for the use of their lines. I have made a careful study of their lines, and any attempt to hook up the two dams by the use of their lines would be an abortion—their lines do not have the capacity and the hook-up would be a makeshift, to say the least. Owing to the special conditions which surround this hook-up, this line must be a heavy duty one—not less than 154,000 volts—and from an economic standpoint should not follow the rivers, but cut across on approximately a straight line, as I have indicated on the special map which went to the President with my brochure on January 19, 1933.

So it is evident that this man has been consulting with the President about it.

He says further:

Two things would happen if a patched-up hook were made between these two dams over Tennessee Power Co. lines. One of these is that nothing but grief and trouble could result; and secondly, the power company would get a large amount of power without paying a cent for it. The power people, when an attempt was made to get some idea from them as to how much power from the Wilson Dam—went to companies in other States, emphasized the fact that they could not tell inasmuch as you could not tag and label power once it was fed into transmission lines. That is true to such an extent that if Cove Creek and Wilson Dams were hooked up by transmission and distribution lines of the Tennessee Power Co. not even the recording angel could tell how many millions of hours of energy they would get without paying a cent for it. I have little doubt but what they would be perfectly delighted to build a complete transmission line under such conditions—because they could get enough free power every year to pay for the line several times over.

That is Dam No. 2—

Now, listen:

That is what this engineer says—their engineer, not mine. Reading on:

Since the House bill was redrafted in executive session I have studied carefully every provision in it from the technical and operating points of view, and to my mind from an operating and economic standpoint it is absolutely essential that the House recede from its stand on the transmission features. I do not believe that the board which will control the policies of the Tennessee Valley authority will have "death and destruction" for their motto, and that they will conduct the affairs with which they are charged in a sound business way without setting out to destroy any kind or class of industry.

Since the bill passed the Senate, I have heard the fear expressed that under the Senate amendment relative to power transmission the authority could proceed to wreck all of the power companies in that area and would probably proceed along those lines in a ruthless way. I do not believe that the board the President will appoint will attempt to embark on a campaign of industrial sabotage, and I feel sure that if they did the President would take a hand in it without delay.

Along the same line, I have heard it expressed (not by Members of Congress) that in drafting the transmission and distribution features of his bill, Senator NORRIS had in mind the practical destruction of existing power companies.

Every word of that, 100 percent, is false, and always has been; and every man who has had anything to do with me in the drafting of this legislation and the fight that has been going on for 12 years knows that there is not a scintilla of truth in it.

I read on:

That Senator NORRIS was not imbued with the idea of "death and destruction" is apparent in the extremely liberal provisions he made in his bill for hook-ups and interchange of power with private companies—these provisions being very broad and certainly very liberal.

And you have only to read the Senate bill to know it. Authority is given in the Senate bill to lease transmission lines, and then to lease to private companies transmission lines which the Government owns. Authority is given to make hook-ups with all private companies, to have them hooked up all the time, ready for accidents or anything of that kind that may happen to either system. Nowhere in the bill is there a word or a syllable that any honest man can construe to mean that we are trying to destroy other lines.

I read on:

To my mind, if there is any sting in the authority given the board in regard to the construction of transmission lines by the Senate amendments, this is more than compensated for in the liberal provisions for the hook-up and interchange of power with private companies.

It is to be assumed that the board appointed by the President will be composed of men of experience, and in case no member of the board is technically trained, the necessary technical advisers will be arranged for. In either case it is to be assumed that good business judgment will be exercised in the disposition of surplus power, and that where the interests of the public will be conserved and the intents of the legislation carried out there is little doubt but what amicable arrangements will be entered into with private interests relative to the distribution of power. However, as I interpret the language of the House bill, the restrictions and limitations of the transmission provisions are such as to give the private power companies a club over the board which would to a large extent "hamstring" it in the effort to provide cheaper power to the ultimate consumer.

I am not trying to put a construction on the provision not in it, but I am trying to interpret it as I would if I were a member of the board trying to carry out the mandate of the Congress. It is on these grounds I feel that the House must recede very materially from the language it wrote into the bill.

Now, Mr. President, he is going to answer another claim, the one about widows and orphans. Now he is going to tell what happened to the market after the Senate bill was passed. It was said that if we enacted the Senate bill the widows and orphans who owned stocks and bonds in the various companies were going to lose everything they had. Let us see what happened. I read further:

During the hearings, April 11-15, the power interests painted a most direful picture of the destructive effect of legislation such as was contemplated, with especial reference to the preferred stocks and bonds held by widows and orphans, and in this connection it is of interest to note that when the House passed H.R. 5081, the preferred stock of the Commonwealth & Southern—

That is a holding company, controlling companies all over the territory down in Alabama, Georgia, and Tennessee—

the preferred stock of the Commonwealth & Southern was selling at $21.50 per share. By the time the bill passed the Senate the selling price had gone up to $28.50, and since the bill passed the Senate the price has gone up to $33.875—

Oh, think of these widows and orphans. Think of these poor children left alone, suffering, having their life savings wiped out by this act of Congress, this cruel Senate bill. As a matter of fact their stock all took a jump the minute the Senate bill was passed—

By the time the bill passed the Senate the selling price had gone up to $28.50, and since the bill passed the Senate the price has gone up to $33.875, or more than $5 a share since the Senate acted. The indications are that the owners are not overly scared.

Yours very truly,

J. EDWARD CASSIDY,
Consulting Engineer.

Mr. President, I think that right at this time, when all over this city, especially on this Hill, there are all sorts of innuendos and all sorts of propaganda which the Power Trust is hurling at us and the House, it is proper that I should call attention now, right while they are obstructing, to the fact that editorials such as I have read from the Birmingham News and others, which are going to deluge the House of Representatives in the next day or so, are based on a false theory. They know it is false. They know it is untrue.

What, then, is their motive? Nothing under God's heaven is left except for them to admit the truth, that they are owned and controlled by the Power Trust.

PROTECTION OF INVESTORS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 875) to provide for the furnishing of information and the supervision of traffic in investment securities in interstate commerce.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I wish to propose an amendment to come on page 37, lines 1 and 2, to strike out the words "with respect to each other class."

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, a Member of the Senate who is not in the Chamber at present requested that he be notified when the Senator from Nebraska had concluded. I therefore suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LOGAN in the chair). The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Couzens	Kean	Reynolds
Ashurst	Cutting	Kendrick	Robinson, Ark.
Austin	Dale	Keyes	Robinson, Ind.
Bachman	Dickinson	King	Russell
Bailey	Dieterich	La Follette	Sheppard
Bankhead	Dill	Logan	Shipstead

Caraway	Harrison	Nye	Wagner
Carey	Hastings	Overton	Walcott
Connally	Hatfield	Patterson	Wheeler
Coolidge	Hayden	Pittman	White
Copeland	Hebert	Pope
Costigan	Johnson	Reed

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-six Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask to have stated the amendment I have offered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 37, line 1, after the word "class" and the comma, the Senator from Florida proposes to strike out the words "with respect to each other class", so as to read:

(4) A statement of the capitalization of the issuer, including the authorized and paid up amounts of its capital stock, the number and classes of shares into which such capital stock is divided, the par value thereof, or if it has no par value, the stated or assigned value thereof; a description of the respective voting rights, preferences, conversion and exchange of rights, rights to dividends, profits, or capital of each class, including the retirement and liquidation rights or values thereof.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, on page 38, line 21, after the word "investment", I move to insert the words "and the net amount received or to be received thereafter by the issuer", so as to read:

A detailed statement of the plan upon which the issuer proposes to dispose of the securities offered for registration, the price at which they are offered to the public, the net amount returnable to capital investment, and the net amount received or to be received thereafter by the issuer.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FLETCHER. On page 47, line 22, after the word "investment", I move to insert the same words "and the net amount received or to be received thereafter by the issuer", so as to read:

The price at which it is offered to the public, the net amount to be returned to capital investment, and the net amount received or to be received thereafter by the issuer.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FLETCHER. On page 47, line 23, after the words "amount of", to insert the words "discount, rebate," so as to read:

The price at which it is offered to the public, the net amount to be returned to capital investment, and the net amount received or to be received thereafter by the issuer, as well as the maximum amount of discount, rebate, commission, or other form or remuneration to be paid in cash or otherwise, directly or indirectly, for or in connection with the sale or offering for sale of such securities.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FLETCHER. On page 52, lines 18 and 19, I move to strike out the words "or other public utility", so as to read:

(b) Any security issued by and representing an interest in or a direct obligation of any common carrier subject to regulation or supervision as to the issue of its securities or its accounts by a commission, board, or officers of the Government of the United States; or any such security issued by any national bank; or by any corporation created and controlled by and acting as an instrumentality of the Government of the United States pursuant to authority granted by the Congress of the United States.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, as I understand it, the committee amendments have all been acted on.

Mr. FLETCHER. That completes the committee amendments.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I want to offer an amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have an amendment to offer, but if the Senator's amendment will not take very long to consider, I will yield to him.

Mr. ADAMS. It is a small amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield.

Mr. ADAMS. On page 29, lines 23 and 24, I move to strike out the words "when such paper is not offered or intended to be offered for sale to the public."

The matter has been discussed with the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], and it is intended to protect from the operation of the act certain paper which should not be included along with commercial paper, since it merely circulates among banks, instead of the general public.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think it is a very good amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I have an amendment which I think is of some importance, and I would be very glad, indeed, if the Members of the Senate would give it their attention.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from California will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from California moves as follows:

To add to the bill a new title, to be known as "title II", as follows:

"TITLE II"

"Sec. 201. For the purpose of protecting, conserving, and advancing the interests of the holders of foreign securities in default, there is hereby created a body corporate with the name 'Corporation of Foreign Security Holders' (herein called the 'Corporation'). The principal office of the Corporation shall be located in the District of Columbia, but there may be established agencies or branch offices in any city or cities of the United States under rules and regulations prescribed by the board of directors.

"Sec. 202. The control and management of the Corporation shall be vested in a board of 12 directors, who shall be appointed and hold office in the following manner: As soon as practicable after the date this act takes effect the commission shall appoint 12 directors, and shall designate a chairman and a vice chairman from among their number. After the directors designated as chairman and vice chairman cease to be directors, their successors as chairman and vice chairman shall be elected by the board of directors itself. Of the directors first appointed, 4 shall continue in office for a term of 2 years, 4 for a term of 4 years, and 4 for a term of 6 years from the date this act takes effect, the term of each to be designated by the commission at the time of appointment. Their successors shall be elected by the board of directors, each for a term of 6 years from the date of the expiration of the term for which his predecessor was appointed, except that any person appointed to fill a vacancy occurring prior to the expiration of the term for which his predecessor was appointed shall be appointed only for the unexpired term of such predecessor. No person shall be eligible to serve as a director who within the 5 years preceding has had any interest, direct or indirect, in any corporation, company, partnership, bank, or association which has sold, or offered to sale, any foreign securities. The office of a director shall be vacated if the board of directors shall at a meeting specially convened for that purpose by resolution passed by a majority of at least three fourths of the board of directors, remove such member from office, provided that the member whom it is proposed to remove shall have 7 days' notice sent to him of such meeting and that he may be heard.

"Sec. 203. The Corporation shall have power to adopt, alter, and use a corporate seal; to make contracts; to lease such real estate as may be necessary for the transaction of its business; to sue and be sued; to complain and to defend, in any court of competent jurisdiction, State or Federal; to require from trustees, financial agents, or dealers in foreign securities information relative to the original or present holders of foreign securities and such other information as may be required and to issue subpoenas therefor; to take over the functions of any fiscal and paying agents of any foreign securities in default; to borrow money for the purposes of this title, and to pledge as collateral for such loans any securities deposited with the Corporation pursuant to this title; by and with the consent and approval of the Commission, to select, employ, and fix the compensation of officers, directors, members of committees, employees, attorneys, and agents of the Corporation, without regard to the provisions of other laws applicable to the employment and compensation of officers or employees of the United States; to define their authority and duties, require bonds of them and fix the penalties thereof, and to dismiss at pleasure such officers, employees, attorneys, and agents; and to prescribe, amend, and repeal, by its board of directors, bylaws, rules, and regulations governing the manner in which its general business may be conducted and the powers granted to it by law may be exercised and enjoyed, together with provisions for such committees and the functions thereof as the board of directors may deem necessary for facilitating its business under this title. The board of directors of the Corporation shall determine and prescribe the manner in which its obligations shall be incurred and its expenses allowed and paid.

"Sec. 204. The board of directors may—

"(1) Convene meetings of holders of foreign securities.

"(2) Invite the deposit and undertake the custody of foreign securities which have defaulted in the payment either of principal or interest, and issue receipts or certificates in the place of securities so deposited.

"(3) Appoint committees from the directors of the Corporation and/or other persons to represent holders of any class or classes of foreign securities which have defaulted in the payment either of principal or interest and determine and regulate the functions of such committees. The chairman and vice chairman of the board of directors shall be ex officio chairman and vice chairman of each committee.

"(4) Negotiate and carry out, or assist in negotiating and carrying out, arrangements for the resumption of payments due or in arrears in respect of any foreign securities in default or for rearranging the terms on which such securities may in future be held or for converting and exchanging the same for new securities or for any other object in relation thereto; and under this paragraph any plan or agreement made with respect to such securities shall be binding upon depositors, providing that the consent of holders resident in the United States of 60 percent of the securities deposited with the Corporation shall be obtained.

"(5) Undertake, superintend, or take part in the collection and application of funds derived from foreign securities which come into the possession of or under the control or management of the Corporation.

"(6) Collect, preserve, publish, circulate, and render available in readily accessible form, when deemed essential or necessary, documents, statistics, reports, and information of all kinds in respect of foreign securities, including particularly records of foreign external securities in default and records of the progress made toward the payment of past-due obligations.

"(7) Take such steps as it may deem expedient with the view of securing the adoption of clear and simple forms of foreign securities and just and sound principles in the conditions and terms thereof.

"(8) Generally, act in the name and on behalf of the holders of foreign securities the care or representation of whose interests may be entrusted to the Corporation; conserve and protect the rights and interests of holders of foreign securities issued, sold, or owned in the United States; adopt measures for the protection, vindication, and preservation or reservation of the rights and interests of holders of foreign securities either on any default in or on breach or contemplated breach of the conditions on which such foreign securities may have been issued, or otherwise; obtain for such holders such legal and other assistance and advice as the board of directors may deem expedient; and do all such other things as are incident or conducive to the attainment of the above objects.

"Sec. 205. The board of directors shall cause accounts to be kept of all matters relating to or connected with the transactions and business of the Corporation, and cause a general account and balance sheet of the Corporation to be made out in each year, and cause all accounts to be audited by one or more auditors, who shall examine the same and report thereon to the board of directors.

"Sec. 206. The Corporation shall make, print, and make public an annual report of its operations during each year, send a copy thereof, together with a copy of the account and balance sheet and auditor's report, to the Commission and to both Houses of Congress, and provide one copy of such report but not more than one on the application of any person and on receipt of a sum not exceeding $1: Provided, That the board of directors in its discretion may distribute copies gratuitously.

"Sec. 207. The Corporation may in its discretion levy charges, assessed on a pro rata basis, on the holders of foreign securities deposited with it, provided that any charge levied at the time of depositing securities with the Corporation shall not exceed one fifth of 1 percent of the face value of such securities, and provided further that any additional charges shall bear a close relationship to the cost of operations and negotiations, including those enumerated in sections 203 and 204, and shall not exceed 1 percent of the face value of such securities.

"Sec. 208. The Corporation may receive subscriptions from any person, foundation with a public purpose or agency of the United States Government, and except that such subscriptions may, in the discretion of the board of directors, be treated as loans repayable when and as the board of directors shall determine.

"Sec. 209. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is hereby authorized to grant out of its funds the sum of $50,000 annually for 3 years for the use of the Corporation.

"Sec. 210. This title may be cited as the 'Corporation of Foreign Bondholders Act, 1933.'"

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, in the matter of the control of foreign securities, we are thrice blessed in the matter of bills designed to protect in the future their issuance and their sale. I would be very glad if our friends on the other side would give me their attention if they are not familiar with the amendment I now present; if they are familiar with the amendment, I do not ask their attention; but if they are not, I would be very glad if they would give me their attention for a brief period.

The measure that is proposed today by the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] is wise and salutary. There have been three bills of this character before the Congress, one of which I originally introduced, and that has been reported favorably by the Judiciary Committee; the second of which, termed the "Rayburn bill", has been passed by the House; and the third, introduced by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] for the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] and approved by the Committee on Banking and Currency, comes to us today.

Any one of the bills is good. Although I was interested in the subject before most of those here gave it attention at all, it is a matter of no consequence to me whose bill may be enacted, whether it be the one or the other. I should like to prevent in the future a recurrence of what has happened in the past.

It was demonstrated, and demonstrated conclusively, before the Finance Committee a year or so ago that there had been sold in this country foreign securities—and with them particularly do I deal—which some of those who offered them for sale, supposedly great reputable banking houses, knew full well would probably be defaulted and probably never would be paid; and yet with knowledge before them by reports of their own investigators, with knowledge before them of reports upon the financial condition of various nations whose securities they were selling, knowing, as I say, that there would probably never be realized upon those bonds a tithe of what the American people were paying for them, by means of high-powered salesmanship, and with a kind of prospectus that none of us, indeed, would indulge or countenance, they were able to palm off upon the American public literally some billions of dollars worth of foreign securities, and thus practically—aye, literally—rob the American people and the investing public. The bills which have been presented, including the one which has come before us today, are designed to prevent a recurrence of that sort of wrong in the future, and they will accomplish what ought to have been accomplished long, long ago—a mode by which publicity may be had concerning the securities which are offered for sale, by which liability may be attached to those who offer them, and by which there may finally be protection for the investing American public.

I seek to do another thing by this amendment. We seek now, all of us, to shut the door of the stable after the horse is gone and to protect our people in the future, a high duty, indeed, and one which ought to be performed. I am trying by the creation of a public corporation, within the structure of the protective system provided for in the pending bill, to give some place the swindled investor may go for the deposit of his particular security and receive the aid of the organization thus created.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, may I interrupt to ask the Senator from California two questions?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BARKLEY in the chair). Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield.

Mr. ADAMS. The Senator from California is speaking of the creation of a corporation. His amendment provides, if I have read it correctly, for the appointment of a board of directors of the new corporation by the Federal Trade Commission. Then it provides that from that time on the board of directors shall appoint its own successors; that is, it is to be self-perpetuating. I am wondering why the appointment is to be vested in the Federal Trade Commission?

Mr. JOHNSON. The bill before us provides that there shall be a commission, which shall in the future endeavor to protect investors. That commission has been fixed as the Federal Trade Commission. Personally, I did not prefer that at all; I should have preferred the commission proposed to be created in the bill introduced by me and reported by the Judiciary Committee. I took the three heads of departments that have dealt and are dealing with this subject, and those three heads of departments—the Secretary of State, the Secretary of Commerce, and the chairman of the Federal Reserve Board—are made the commission in the bill I introduced, favorably reported by the Judiciary Committee, which would deal with the subject in the future; but I did not want, in any degree, to interfere with the bill that has been reported from the Banking and Currency Committee; and so I have taken now the commission that the Banking and Currency Committee bill creates, and that commission which will deal with the subject in the future is the Federal Trade Commission. I have given them the right of appointment of the directors, in the first instance, of course, because it is the commission having jurisdiction of the subject, and I have given it to that commission because I cannot, in my opinion, entrust it to the selection of those who in the past have floated these foreign securities and have been the purveyors of them to the American public.

I cannot do entirely as the British corporate act does, but, as best I could, I have endeavored to create within the structure that is set up in the pending bill with the very means provided by this measure, a corporation which may salvage, if it be possible, something at least for those who have been mulcted by the sale of bad securities in the days gone by. That is what I am endeavoring to do.

Mr. ADAMS. Does not the Senator think it rather a bad precedent to create a self-perpetuating board? Would it not be better to come back to the Federal Trade Commission to appoint successors rather than refer that matter to the board of directors?

Mr. JOHNSON. I have not the slightest objection. The form is not appealing to me. I shall be very glad to accept whatever the best thought in the Senate may be in regard to any particular amendment, any particular thought or suggestion, any particular method of selection. What I do want is some place where the man who has bought these securities in good faith, paid his money, and has been robbed and impoverished may go and present his securities and have some sort of aid rendered unto him. That is the beneficent purpose I am seeking to accomplish here.

It is necessary from another standpoint. I think I speak by the book when I say that there has been a regular racket in the matter of foreign securities practiced in some of the cities of this land. Some organizations are excellent. In good faith they are making an endeavor to do their duty. Other organizations are under the control, absolutely, of the very people who sold the rotten securities, and they make of this sort of thing a racket which we ought to prevent, if we can prevent it. That is one of the purposes of the amendment I have suggested.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly.

Mr. FLETCHER. Instead of creating a separate corporation as the amendment does, why not have the Federal Trade Commission invested with authority to do the thing that is proposed to be done?

Mr. JOHNSON. I thought it much more appropriate to create a separate corporation than to have the Federal Trade Commission dealing with events of the past and being itself a repository of the securities that had been sold in the fashion that many of these securities have been sold. I would not care if we had the Federal Trade Commission do it. It is the beneficial fact that I want to accomplish. I want to do something more, because I was greatly interested in what had been done in the investigation conducted before the Finance Committee of the Senate a year or more ago. I want to do something if I can whereby these people may be protected who have been treated in the fashion that they have by those who made great profits out of the selling of foreign securities.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. On page 7, section 207 authorizes the corporation to assess the bondholders. I presume that is for the purpose of administering the provisions of the bill?

Mr. JOHNSON. Oh, yes. I assumed, and the fact of the matter is, that under its general powers the corporation could do that anyway, but in order to make it certain I give them that right. Of necessity they can deal only with those securities which come voluntarily to them. With the authority contained in the law itself on the right of assessment, it was my thought that it would make plainer to investors exactly what is contemplated.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly.

Mr. KING. I came into the Chamber after the Senator's amendment was tendered and I am not familiar with its provisions except as I am able to infer from that part of the explanation which I heard. What difference is between the new amendment and calendar 44, the bill (S. 882) to provide for the more effective supervision of foreign commercial transactions, and for other purposes, as reported by the Judiciary Committee?

Mr. JOHNSON. I am not touching that bill at all. This is another title entirely and does not deal with the subject matter of that bill except insofar as foreign securities that are in default might be dealt with.

Mr. KING. Has the amendment just tendered been offered heretofore and considered by any committee?

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not know. It was offered on the floor some weeks ago and has been printed and has been lying on the table. There are some emendations which I made today with respect to it, but the amendment in its general form has been lying on the table some weeks.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly.

Mr. KEAN. I would like to ask the Senator whether he will not limit the amount of the assessment that the commission may ask the depositors to pay? It is usually limited in similar cases to one fourth or one half of 1 percent.

Mr. JOHNSON. Unless I misunderstand the Senator's question we have done exactly that thing. We provide that any charge levied at the time of depositing the securities with the corporation shall not exceed one fifth of 1 percent.

Mr. KEAN. But is the total charge limited?

Mr. JOHNSON. Subsequently it is provided "any charge shall not exceed 1 percent of the face value of such security."

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator permit a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly.

Mr. REED. Perhaps it has already been answered. I just came into the Chamber. I take it from a hasty reading of the amendment as modified that the corporation would have practically the same powers and functions as are now enjoyed by the British corporation of foreign-bond holders?

Mr. JOHNSON. It was my hope that that might be so. I have not succeeded wholly, I confess, because I think there are greater powers in the British act than we accord here.

Mr. REED. I take it that this provision does not affect the transfer of foreign securities from one individual to another.

Mr. JOHNSON. Oh, no.

Mr. REED. In the same way the bill now on the calendar would affect them.

Mr. JOHNSON. No; I am not dealing with that subject. What I am trying to do is what the British have done, and done most admirably. If the Senator will read the last report of the British organization, he will see, as he doubtless knows without my saying so, how they have gone into every country practically on the face of the earth. They have gone in under their law after the formation of a corporation for the purpose of protecting their security holders. They have done it in a fashion that wins the highest respect and admiration of one like myself. I am seeking in some degree to afford some place where the swindled investor may deposit his securities and be perfectly certain that he is not in a racket where some of those who have sold the securities to him are controlling the organization, and from which he may hope for a useful service and a helpful service as well.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit a further interruption very briefly—

Mr. JOHNSON. I am very glad to do so.

Mr. REED. I think it has been in some cases almost scandalous to read of the personnel and legal representation of the so-called "committees" for the protection of holders of defaulted bonds. I have noticed a number of them in which the original issuing house had apparently named all of the members of the so-called "committee", had named the legal counsel, and were very obviously in control of the rights of those people whose interests were adverse to themselves.

Mr. JOHNSON. The Senator is entirely correct. It has become in some instances a regular racket. One of the things I was trying most sedulously to avoid was the possibility of that thing occurring in the future. If we look at the directorate provided for, cumbersome possibly, it will be seen that we provide that no individual who was concerned in the original issue or sale and the like can become a member.

Mr. REED. I am glad of that.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am seeking in any way that may be possible to give us a public agency that will salvage, conserve, protect, aid in some way the American investor who has been swindled, and the little that may remain to him; and I aim to keep the seller of worthless securities off the directorate that will have authority to deal with the doubtful and defaulted securities.

Mr. REED. The submission of one's securities and one's rights to this corporation is optional with the particular security holder, I take it?

Mr. JOHNSON. Oh, purely so.

Mr. REED. Without undertaking to pass on the details of the amendment, because I have not had a chance to study it, I should like to say that I am heartily in sympathy with the Senator's purpose.

Mr. JOHNSON. I want to express my gratification because oftentimes the Senator and I are at loggerheads. In this instance we are agreed, and I take it, therefore, that any of my skeptical brethren over on the other side of the Chamber may be perfectly certain that we are trying to do something that is of value and something that ought to be done.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield.

Mr. ADAMS. As I understand the parliamentary situation, it is such that I could not now offer an amendment. I would suggest, along the line of my previous inquiry, that in place of the provision on page 2 of the typewritten part, where it provides "their successors shall be elected by the board of directors"—in other words, elected by themselves—the language should be changed to read, "that their successors shall be appointed by the Commission."

Mr. JOHNSON. I have not the slightest objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Amendments are in order to the amendment offered by the Senator from California.

Mr. JOHNSON. I shall be very glad, with the permission of the Chair, to accept an amendment of that sort.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California may modify his amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON. The Senator refers to the sentence on page 2 which begins, "Their successors shall be elected by the board of directors."

Mr. ADAMS. Yes. I would have it read that they "shall be appointed by the Commission."

Mr. JOHNSON. Let me state the amendment and see if I state it accurately. After the word "elected", on page 2, strike out the words "by the board of directors" and insert in lieu thereof "by the Commission."

Mr. ADAMS. The bill itself designates the commission as meaning the Federal Trade Commission.

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes; I know that.

Mr. ADAMS. I would strike out the word "elected" and insert the word "appointed."

Mr. JOHNSON. Very well. Let it be changed to read then that "their successors shall be appointed by the Commission."

Mr. KING. Mr. President, before that is passed upon may I interrupt the Senator?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly.

Mr. KING. What is the necessity, if this is voluntary—that is to say, if the bondholders may or may not deposit their bonds with this corporation—for creating a Federal corporation? Why may not there be formed in one or all the States, if their corporation laws permitted, corporations of this character, organizations for the purpose of executing the powers and carrying out the responsibilities that are to be devolved upon the corporation here to be created?

Mr. JOHNSON. It is quite possible that corporations of that character might be formed in every State of the Union, but this is an endeavor legislatively to form one corporation which may do the job. It would seem to me that is much preferable to relegating the various holders of securities to the different States and then going about in other States to collect others similarly situated to form such a corporation.

Mr. KING. May I say to the Senator that I have some doubt as to the power, legally and constitutionally, of the Federal Government to create a corporation other than corporations that are to carry on some of the functions of the Federal Government. The power to create corporations belongs to the States except as to those corporations of a governmental character.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if I may interrupt, we have organized the American Legion, for example.

Mr. KING. May I say that the Committee on the Judiciary, looking over the record of a large number of corporations some years ago, such as the Armenian Committee and others, reached the conclusion that those corporations having a private character organized for the purpose of carrying on private activities ought not to be created under act of Congress, and I entirely sympathize with that view. If we are making this a governmental corporation to carry on a governmental function, that is one thing. If it is a private corporation to aid in private activities, that is another thing; and if it is, I see no reason for creating a Federal corporation.

I know the argument is often made that a Federal charter gives to a corporation a prestige and a power and an authority and an influence among the people that a corporation organized in the State of New York or the State of Pennsylvania would not have; but I cannot conceive of the authority of the Federal Government to grant these charters for all sorts of private activities. It seems to me it is a perversion of the authority and power of the Federal Government so to do.

I am making this observation wholly impersonally, without reference to the corporation now before us.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to say a word in answer to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield.

Mr. REED. I have always had considerable doubt of the power of the Federal Congress to incorporate corporations, as we have been doing in the past for a good many different kinds of charities. We incorporated the American Legion. We have incorporated a lot of other eleemosynary or fraternal organizations.

Mr. KING. None lately, however.

Mr. REED. It is only comparatively recently that our Judiciary Committee and the Senate as a whole have set their faces rather sternly against continuing the practice; but I think in this case there is a real reason—perhaps not a constitutional justification, but at least a practical reason—for doing it in this way.

I can easily conceive that corporations with high-sounding titles would be formed by these interested parties within the States just as they form bondholders' committees today. It would be just as easy for the issuing house to put their clerks into a corporation with some grandiose title and use it as they are using today these dummy committees that they organize. That is the practical reason, I think, why it ought to be done in this way.

I do not like the idea of having the Trade Commission nominate the directors, because in all likelihood those directors will be mere political appointees, particularly if they draw down substantial compensation; and yet at the moment I cannot think of any better way of doing it.

Mr. JOHNSON. I started, may I say to the Senator, with having the President appoint the directors. Then I thought his duties were such, inasmuch as we were forming a commission to deal with the subject generally, that I better return the power to the Federal Trade Commission.

Mr. REED. I agree with the Senator. We have given the President power to regulate everything but the weather, and he is going to be tolerably busy for the next few years. I wish, however, that he could put some sort of check on the action of the Federal Trade Commission.

Mr. JOHNSON. The Federal Trade Commission is given the full power in the general bill to which this is an amendment.

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is why I think it the appropriate thing. I do not know whether the Senator was here when I explained the original idea that I had in regard to the matter. He will find in the bill that is before him, which was reported by the Judiciary Committee, that I formed a different sort of commission—the Secretary of State, the Secretary of Commerce, and the head of the Federal Reserve System. I did that because I knew, from the investigation we had had, that the State Department had certain information upon the subject; I knew that the Department of Commerce had certain information upon the subject, and I knew that the Federal Reserve System probably had some information; but I did not want to interfere with the bill of the Senator from Florida, in which he creates his commission out of the Federal Trade Commission, and so that was one of the reasons.

During the time that we were preparing this bill I collated all the corporations that had been formed by the Congress of the United States. I am sorry that I left the list upon my desk, and have not it here. I am not doubtful of the constitutionality of what we do; and beyond that, so well put have been the reasons, outside of the legal aspect, by the Senator from Pennsylvania, that nothing need be added. Corporations, as Senators know, could not be formed in each State of the Union, and there could not be the control in each State in the Union that we desire to have over this sort of subject matter. It can be done only by the Central Government, and it can be done effectively only in the fashion in which we have endeavored to do it here.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I have not had an opportunity to examine the amendment offered by the Senator from California or the amended amendment which I am advised was read a few moments ago while I was absent from the Chamber participating in a committee meeting.

I have just secured a copy of the amendment, but am not familiar with the terms of either it or the amendment to the amendment; and hastily examining the amendment I observe that it is a corporation to "protect the interests of the holders of foreign securities in default." Apparently it is not to aid persons who intend to purchase foreign securities. I assume that the principal purpose of the measure is to aid American purchasers of foreign securities in those cases in which there has been a default in payment of principal or interest upon such securities. As is known, foreign securities—governmental, municipal, or otherwise—during the past few years were sold to the American public. Many of these securities have diminished in value until the market values of some of them are but a small percent of the prices paid for the same by the public in the United States. Undoubtedly the losses sustained by the purchasers of these securities will be very great, and I assume it is thought that under the terms of this bill the holders of these securities may be aided in recovering as much as possible upon the same and thus diminish the losses which they will ultimately sustain.

I am not quite certain as to the nature of the corporation which is to be created. It would seem that any corporation formed to aid the security holders in salvaging as much as possible of these securities would be a private corporation. In the imperfect and hasty glance I have given the bill I have been unable to perceive that its functions are governmental or that it is a corporation organized pursuant to authority conferred upon the Federal Government. At any rate, as I understand the bill, it is not organized to execute functions of a national or international character. It seems to me that we should first determine whether the organization to be formed is private or public; whether it is a corporation of a private character to serve private ends or private purposes, or a corporation formed purely and strictly for governmental purposes. If it is the former, then it would seem that this is not the proper forum in which the corporation is to be created. Private corporations for private purposes should not be created by the Federal Government; it has no valid authority for that purpose.

Reference has been made to the English Securities Act, I assume for the purpose of justifying this proposed legislation. As I understand the contention, Great Britain has a securities act containing provisions for protecting the purchasers of securities where there has been a default in the payment of the interest or principal of securities sold to the public. I do not concede that legislation by Parliament of the character indicated is a precedent which should be followed by the Federal Government. The authority of the Federal Government is not as broad or as comprehensive in dealing with many questions and matters as that enjoyed by the Parliament of Great Britain. Parliament is supreme in dealing with matters relating to the domestic affairs of Great Britain, or in dealing with national and international questions affecting Great Britain. It enacts laws dealing with private corporations; and, generally speaking, discharges the functions and responsibilities which appertain to sovereign States of our Union. The British Parliament, as I am advised, not infrequently grants private charters for the carrying on of business activities not at all connected with governmental functions.

Under our form of government the States deal with matters of a domestic character. The States are sovereign within their spheres; they have certain governmental functions and exercise police powers. They have the right to enact laws under which corporations may be formed to carry on private enterprises. There are several hundred thousand corporations within the United States which were created by and under laws enacted by the various States. It is not the function of the Federal Government to deal with these internal and domestic questions and to create corporations of a private nature to carry on private business. I admit that a number of corporations have been formed by Congress which did not fall within the category of governmental agencies. Insofar as this has been done, I think Congress exceeded its authority. Certainly in so doing its actions were questionable.

There ought to be no occasion in this body to challenge attention to the limitations imposed upon the Federal Government. Within its sphere it is supreme, but its powers are circumscribed and its authority is only that granted to it by the Constitution. The States are supreme within their sphere, and the Federal Government transcends its authority when it invades the rights of the sovereign States. It would be most unfortunate if the States were to lose their identity and become mere geographical expressions. The devitalization of the States would be destructive of our form of government.

In periods of economic or political peril there are movements, powerful and too often irresistible, in favor of the consolidation of political authority in the hands of a limited number and to increase the authority of the central or National Government. In the War between the States the authority of the National Government was greatly increased, with the result that the authority of the States was weakened. It is true, as I have stated, that there are historical precedents for the movements in favor of aggrandizing the Federal Government; and in this economic crisis, which has its repercussions in our political institutions, it is to be expected that the authority of the Federal Government will extend beyond the limits and boundaries in which it was exercised in days of prosperity and periods of industrial and economic peace. We may regret the transference of authority from communities and States to the National Government, and deplore the existence of conditions economic or otherwise that are relied upon as justification for such transference of authority.

Speaking for myself and without reference to the immediate present and the legislation which is receiving approval, I deplore the growing disregard of individual and State rights, of community consciousness, and of that democratic spirit which influenced the founders of this Republic and found expression in the philosophy upon which rested our dual form of government under which there was reserved to the States and to the people, respectively, all authority not granted to the National Government. I submit that there is no grant of authority to the Federal Government to create private corporations or supervise their activities as such.

The corporations to which I have referred are the creations of the States, subject to State laws and amenable to such regulations as the States may prescribe. As I have indicated, however, we are increasing the power of the Federal Government, and it more and more is bringing the States and the people within its control and subjecting them to national supervision in a fashion never dreamed of by those who gave us the Constitution of the United States.

It would seem from a hasty glance at the measure offered by the Senator from California that it deals with a subject within the jurisdiction of the States. It creates a corporation, if I understand its provisions, to deal with the property of private individuals, to conserve the same, and to protect it for the advantage of individuals. It is not, if I interpret it correctly, a Government agency to be employed or utilized for governmental purposes. Undoubtedly the Federal Government may create corporations or agencies to execute national governmental functions. There was a time when its authority to create national banks was challenged, but it was contended that they were performing functions of a governmental character.

Undoubtedly the National Government has the authority to set up such agencies or create such corporations as are necessary to discharge governmental functions. The Government would have the right to create a corporation to build war vessels or manufacture war munitions or erect Federal buildings. But there must be some line of demarcation between the proper and legitimate functions of the Federal Government and the rights, powers, and authority of the States. I admit that the line may at times be dim and uncertain, and I concede that the Federal Government has not infrequently crossed the line if it has not obliterated it. Nevertheless, it should be the purpose of all patriotic citizens to protect and defend the States in their authority and prerogatives and also to prevent the Federal Government from transcending its authority. This is not an academic question but one that is ever present, real, and vital. It becomes more important in this period of confusion and bewilderment, particularly when movements are inaugurated in this and other lands destructive of fundamentals and the landmarks set up for the guidance and protection of the people.

An examination of the amendment offered by the Senator from California reveals that the corporation shall be organized, possessing the usual and ordinary powers which would be granted by States to private corporations formed to carry out the purposes indicated in the amendment, and I respectfully suggest that the Federal Government is asked by the amendment to aid private persons in private and individual enterprises and activities. The laws of substantially all the States of the Union authorize the creation of corporations such as is now proposed shall be created by the Federal Government. If this is true, then this amendment has no place here and Congress is not warranted in passing measures such as the amendment before us.

The fact that the corporation to be formed handles foreign securities does not endow it with the qualities of a governmental corporation. Many private corporations are formed to deal in foreign securities as well as domestic securities. Certainly a corporation formed to buy and deal in foreign securities is not a governmental agency and is not discharging governmental functions.

I concede that a situation might arise in which the Federal Government might desire, as a part of some important policy governmental in character, to buy and sell foreign securities or foreign exchange, or, for that matter, foreign commodities, and in furtherance of that object, create a Federal corporation, but again I submit that the corporation to be formed under this amendment is easily distinguishable from such hypothetical Federal corporation. I am told that there are associations—possibly corporations—formed to protect the holders of foreign securities in default. It may be that it is believed by some persons that a Federal charter would give greater prestige and authority to an association or corporation than those already existing or corporations formed under the provision of State laws; but again I submit that the prestige of the Federal Government ought not to be invoked or employed for purely private enterprises.

I call the attention of Senators to the fact that the amendment, as I have hastily examined it, imposes no restrictions upon compensation or salaries to be paid to the officers and agencies of the corporation, and Senators will observe that section 209 of the amendment calls for $150,000 to be paid as a grant or gratuity to the corporation. There are no restrictions upon the use of this large sum. It carries $150,000 "for the use of the corporation." That means, of course, for the payment of salaries and compensation and other corporate expenses.

It is a rather extraordinary proceeding, as I view it, to have the Federal Government create a private corporation for private purposes and private profit and benefit and then require it to pay $50,000 a year for 3 years obviously to meet the salaries of the directors and employees of the corporation and other expenses. Why should the taxpayers of the United States be called upon to pay the expenses of a private corporation and meet the salaries and compensation of its directors and employees?

I observe that under section 206 there is a provision that the corporation shall make an annual report to both Houses of Congress. It would seem to me that this provision and section 209, which calls for $150,000 to be paid by the taxpayers of the United States through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, are designed with the view of relieving the proposed corporation from the claim that it is a private corporation and to envelop it in the cloak of a Federal agency. But, Mr. President, I submit that such contention cannot be sustained. If such were the case, then any corporation obtaining a Federal charter and organized for private gain and private purposes, by inserting in its charter that reports must be made annually to Congress, could derive all the benefits, immunities, and prestige that flow from organizing under a Federal statute; and if the Federal Government appropriated a sum, large or small, to pay the expenses of the operation of such corporation, then it would strengthen the contention that such corporation, organized for private purposes, was endowed with a national character.

The Senator from California has referred to the hearings conducted by the Committee on Finance, which reveal that foreign securities were sold through American investment companies and banking houses and brokers at prices not warranted, and that the purchasers of such securities have lost perhaps hundreds of millions of dollars. I might add that the hearings also revealed what is known to everyone, that securities issued by domestic corporations and by cities, towns, and other political subdivisions, were unloaded upon the public, who have sustained enormous losses because of the decline in the values of such securities. The various forms of securities issued by our domestic corporations and by States and political subdivisions amount to perhaps more than $75,000,000,000. These securities possess but a fraction of the market value of the prices paid by the American people.

If a corporation were formed to protect the purchasers of these securities that are in default I do not think it would be contended that such corporation was a governmental agency, or that it was organized to perform a public function. I see but little difference between the corporation proposed to be formed under the amendment and one that might be formed to handle and conserve domestic securities in default.

That a wrong was committed against the American public by the sale of many of these securities, foreign and domestic, must be conceded by all, but such wrong does not in my opinion justify the creation by Congress of one or more corporations to handle securities which are in default.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BARKLEY in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. In view of the fact that these corporations are selling these securities all over the United States in every State in the Union, how would the Senator have the matter controlled except by the National Government?

Mr. KING. As I have indicated, not only were foreign securities but domestic securities sold in all parts of the United States; but I am suggesting that the fact that they have been sold in various parts of the United States does not authorize the Federal Government to form a corporation to deal with the securities that are outstanding and which are in default. It may be that the Federal Government has the authority to enact a law such as the one before us, entitled "A bill to provide for the furnishing of information and the supervision of traffic in investment securities in interstate commerce." This bill which the Senator from California is seeking to amend provides that before securities are issued and sold in interstate commerce certain preliminary steps must be taken by those who seek to issue the securities. The measure is what might be denominated a "Federal blue sky law."

I can see considerable difference between a measure such as the one just referred to and a measure such as suggested in the amendment offered by the Senator from California, which is rather a bill to liquidate certain foreign securities. I might add, however, that under the interpretation which is now being placed upon the interstate provision of the Constitution, there would seem to be no limit to the authority and power of the Federal Government. It is suggested by some that under the interstate-commerce clause, wages may be fixed in private industry, individuals and corporations may be limited in the amount or quantities of production of every form of commodity; that mills and plants and factories may be restricted in the annual production of their respective plants; that a Federal agent may prescribe the number of yards of cloth certain factories may produce or the number of pairs of shoes that a factory may annually manufacture; and, indeed, that every branch of industry may be controlled by the Federal Government if its product enters into interstate commerce. I cannot perhaps off-hand and in the limited time before us fully canvass the question suggested by the Senator from Idaho, but I do not concede that under the power of the Federal Government to regulate interstate commerce it may take charge of all of the business activities of the United States, of all corporations, individuals, and associations, and exercise control and supervision of all of their activities.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to make a suggestion in answer to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. REED. I have great doubt of the constitutionality of the original bill, but no doubt about the constitutionality of the amendment proposed by the Senator from California, and this is why:

It is admittedly the exclusive function of the Federal Government to carry on diplomatic negotiations with foreign lands. One of the most useful of those functions is that of negotiations to protect the interests of Americans who have investments in those foreign lands. This corporation is formed to do exactly that. In other words, it is formed to carry on an admitted prerogative of the Federal Government. That is why I say I have no doubt of the constitutionality of this amendment; but, for the reasons suggested by the Senator, I have grave doubt of the constitutionality of the main bill.

Mr. KING. It may be that the Federal Government has the right to assert a control or supervision over foreign securities which it might not validly assert over purely domestic transactions. Undoubtedly the executive department, probably through the agency of the State Department, would have the right, at the instance of an American citizen who claimed that a foreign government had wronged him or was indebted to him, to make representations to such government in behalf of such citizen, and it may be that the Federal Government possesses the authority to set up an agency to collect claims of American nationals due from foreign governments or the nationals of other governments. That question, however, is not before us and the proposition contained in the amendment is to be differentiated from the hypothetical conditions just suggested.

I revert to a phase of the question which I have been discussing. If the corporation to be formed is a private corporation, that should be clearly understood; and if it is a Federal corporation, we should understand the implications and consequences that might arise therefrom. If it is a Federal agency, then it may be that the Government would be liable for the misdeeds of those placed in charge of the same.

If the corporation to be formed is a Federal organization, it is certainly within the bounds of probability that if the officials of the organization should fail in their duty, should not act with fidelity in the collection of the securities entrusted to them, or should be guilty of embezzlement or malversation in any form, the Government of the United States would be asked to indemnify those who had suffered by reason of their derelictions. I am impressed with the thought that the corporation to be formed under the amendment is a private one, and that the Congress is not the proper forum to deal with the propositions involved in the amendment offered by the Senator from California. In my opinion, the Senate should clearly indicate that the corporation to be formed is not a Federal agency but, upon the contrary, is a private corporation not subject to the control of Congress, and for whose acts and for the acts of its officials and employees the Federal Government is in no wise responsible.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, the Senator from California very aptly used the illustration of locking the stable door after the horse is gone as applied to the bill now pending, and then he pointed out that there ought to be some way of salvaging something from what has already been lost on account of corporations doing the things which this bill endeavors to prevent in the future. There is a great deal in that; I am quite in sympathy with the Senator's view and idea with respect to that, and I am not going to raise any opposition of any consequence to his proposed amendment. I am willing that it shall go to conference, as the bill will have to go, and let this item be considered along with other provisions of the bill by the conferees, who finally will have to reconcile the differences between the Senate and the House.

Mr. President, I do not believe there is any question about the constitutionality of the bill itself. Both the commerce clause of the Constitution and the provision as to post roads cover the grounds which are intended to be reached by the bill. I do not question the constitutionality of a provision such as the proposed amendment. I think we can create such a corporation and authorize it to act. Therefore I am not urging any particular opposition to the amendment and suggest that it might well go to conference and be considered along with the bill itself.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I inquire of the Senator from California why he is exacting, under the terms of the amendment, $150,000 from the United States?

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I have not exacted it; I have given the authority to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. That is the maximum, of course, for which application could be made. But I wanted to leave it in such situation that application could be made and the authority accorded, so that they might perfect the original organization and before they were able to have sufficient numbers in the organization to pay assessments and the like.

Mr. KING. Let me ask the Senator this: Does the amendment provide for a gratuity, or is it a loan?

Mr. JOHNSON. Call it either; I do not care.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, the amendment does provide for assessments upon the bondholders who come to the corporation for the services to be rendered by the corporation.

Mr. JOHNSON. Exactly. I have given authority merely to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

Mr. KING. Does not the Senator think that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation should exact of this corporation security for the loans?

Mr. JOHNSON. It might and it might not, but without according it authority to make a loan it could not indulge in a loan at all.

Mr. KING. I understand.

Mr. JOHNSON. So the authority is given. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation, I assume, will protect its funds, and will do whatever it deems appropriate in the premises.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will modify the language, I should be very glad to have him do so. As it is now, it does not provide for a loan at all.

Mr. JOHNSON. It is an authorization of a grant. I will change it in any way the Senator desires, so that we may get the matter into conference. Let us say that "it is hereby authorized to lend", if the Senator desires.

Mr. KING. I suggest the language "lend out of its funds the sum of $50,000 annually for 3 years for the use of the corporation, upon such security"—

Mr. JOHNSON. There cannot be any security accorded. There is no property which this corporation has. The Senator would add something that could not be done. I am perfectly willing to say that they shall lend it; and, with two governmental agencies, I cannot imagine that there will be the slightest difficulty in ultimate collection; but to say that they can only lend it upon appropriate security would mean that they could not lend it at all.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I understood the Senator to answer a moment ago that assessments were to be levied upon those who participated in the activities of the corporation, and that from those assessments the expenses of conducting the corporation were to be met.

Mr. JOHNSON. Exactly.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The loans are to be in anticipation of the assessments.

Mr. JOHNSON. Exactly.

Mr. KING. But this is a grant, in the language of the amendment, instead of a loan.

Mr. JOHNSON. Call it a loan if you want to.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, this measure applies to the time when the organization is being formed, and before they have the deposit of any securities.

Mr. JOHNSON. Of course.

Mr. KEAN. Therefore, they will have no security to pledge, and so they could not pledge anything. They will have nothing but a board formed, and a few typewriters. That is all they will have.

Mr. JOHNSON. May I say to the Senator from Utah that, if he should like to change the word "grant" to "lend", I have no objection.

Mr. KING. May I ask why this loan or grant must be made for 3 years?

Mr. JOHNSON. It is an arbitrary limit which has been fixed. There is no particular reason for making it 3 any more than 4, or any more than 2.

Mr. KING. Or any more than one, if that will be sufficient to enable them to do the job.

Mr. JOHNSON. The only object was to do what was deemed by the scrivener or the writer of the bill to be the thing that would accomplish the purpose.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator accept an amendment so that the section would read as follows:

The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is hereby authorized to lend, out of its funds, the sum of $50,000 for the use of the corporation.

Mr. JOHNSON. Make it "annually for 2 years." Let us compromise on that.

Mr. KING. I am assuming that this corporation is a going concern.

Mr. JOHNSON. We are hoping so. It is experimental; there is no question about that. It is empirical in character, but there is a job which ought to be done, and I really think the Senator is in sympathy with it.

Mr. KING. I have in mind this situation. We do not know who will be named for directors.

Mr. JOHNSON. Of course, we do not.

Mr. KING. It is obvious, if we are to judge the future by the past, that these officials when they assume their duties will figure that they are men of great ability, and the $50,000 will promptly be levied upon and distributed as salaries, and if they can get $50,000 the next year and $50,000 the third year, it will all be absorbed.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am willing to concede to the Senator that when a man gets into public office, he is perfectly conscious of his own virtues and his own ability, and, being perfectly conscious of them, he is perfectly certain that everybody else on the face of the earth knows of his ability and his virtues. I will grant that to the Senator. But I cannot agree to the latter part of what he said. If the Senator wants, let us make it, "to lend out of its funds the sum of $50,000 annually for 2 years."

Mr. KING. I should prefer to make it as I have suggested.

Mr. JOHNSON. What is the use fiddling around?

Mr. KING. It is not fiddling. The taxpayers of the United States will have to pay, and not a penny will ever come back. I suggest this language:

The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is hereby authorized to lend out of its funds not to exceed $75,000 for the use of the corporation.

Mr. JOHNSON. I will accept that.

Mr. KING. I offer that amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON. I accept it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator modifies his amendment to that extent. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from California as modified.

The amendment as modified was agreed to.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I should like to have the attention of the Chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency. I have had much correspondence from certain business groups in Ohio regarding the pending bill, making specific recommendations as to changes. I had not an opportunity of studying the bill until today. I think the changes have already been made, and I want to make sure of it.

I have a letter from the Chamber of Commerce of Cleveland urging that the bill be limited to issues in the future rather than to those already outstanding.

Mr. FLETCHER. The bill provides for that. It refers only to future issues, except in the case of fraud.

Mr. FESS. That is cared for, then. Another item to which attention has been called I think has also been cared for. The chamber of commerce suggests that not more than three fourths of the directors or trustees be required to sign the registration statement.

Mr. FLETCHER. The bill provides for that.

Mr. FESS. They ask also, in respect of section 6, that the party who would be a defendant be given a chance for hearing. I think section 6 has already provided for a public hearing.

Mr. FLETCHER. Section 7, on page 45, provides for hearings and appeals.

Mr. FESS. Yes; beginning with line 6. I think that is all taken care of.

Mr. FLETCHER. That is cared for.

Mr. FESS. Another suggestion that has been made is as to the requirement in section 9. The chamber of commerce says:

We feel that it should be limited only to situations in which the signer has personal knowledge of the falsity of the statement.

I cannot find that that is taken care of, that if the statement is proven to be erroneous, in order that action may be sustained it must be shown that the falsity of the statement was known to the person who made it; in other words, that he willfully made a false statement. I have read the bill pretty carefully, and I do not think that matter is taken care of.

Mr. FLETCHER. He would not be liable criminally without willfully and knowingly making a false statement.

Mr. KEAN. But financially, under the bill, he would be liable for everything he had.

Mr. FLETCHER. Liable civilly.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, before taking my seat I should like to state that I have assumed from the beginning that there would have to be some legislation of this character. When blue sky law legislation was proposed in the several States I was not very favorably impressed with the general proposition. One of the first States to enact such legislation was my own. During the Ohio Constitutional Convention in 1912 the question of blue sky legislation was considered in extenso. It being an innovation, there was tremendous opposition to it on the ground that the formula of business was caveat emptor—"let the buyer beware." We had not then reached the point "let the seller beware", and there was much opposition to the proposal. I, myself, voted for it with considerable trepidation, thinking that it probably was not of importance, and we might be unnecessarily cluttering up the statute books by giving constitutional sanction to that kind of legislation. However, in the 20 years' duration of that legislation in Ohio there have been many prosecutions, which indicates that advantage has often been taken of investors. So the protection of the public from transactions in fraudulent securities seems to have come to be recognized as a proper legislative function.

The present Presiding Officer [Mr. BARKLEY in the chair] knows that while he was a Member of the other House there was much effort on the part of that body to bring about the enactment of a Federal blue sky law. Our friends from Illinois made great efforts for years to have that kind of legislation enacted. I do not think, however, it ever came over to the Senate. I do not now recall that heretofore any effort has been made in the Senate to secure Federal blue sky legislation, but I think that conditions we have observed in the States justify legislation of this character. It should avoid unnecessary obstructions to business; and I think probably this bill does remove the objections of those who, while not opposed to the legislation itself, thought it might provide obstacles that ought not to be thrown in the way of business. As those objections have been removed, I do not see any particular reason why the bill should not be passed, since the field it embraces was entered upon years ago and such legislation has become general in the States.

I recognize the danger that the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] has suggested; but what is the use of attempting to withstand the enactment of these proposals? We are in this movement; we are legislating for everything; and I do not know what the limit is to be. At any rate, it is true that there has been advantage taken of the public in security-sale transactions; and I shall go along with the committee in supporting the pending bill.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I might suggest to the Senator from Ohio if we are dealing with blue sky laws that "the sky is the limit." [Laughter.]

Mr. FESS. That is true.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment as amended.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I presume the words "title I" ought to be inserted after line 1, on page 29; and then that preceding the amendment offered by the Senator from California the words "title II" ought to be inserted after line 4, on page 61.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the corrections and amendments will be made. The question now is on the committee amendment as amended.

The committee amendment as amended was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate House bill 5480.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the bill (H.R. 5480) to provide full and fair disclosure of the character of securities sold in interstate and foreign commerce and through the mails, and to prevent frauds in the sale thereof, and for other purposes, which was read twice by its title.

Mr. FLETCHER. I move to strike out all after the enacting clause of the House bill and to insert in lieu thereof the Senate bill as it has been amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Florida to strike out of the House bill all after the enacting clause and in its place to insert the language of the Senate bill 875 as amended.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, will that action preclude further amendments to the Senate bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Technically, from a parliamentary standpoint, the language substituted will still be open to amendment.

Mr. KEAN. I should like to have considered a question in connection with the Senate bill before it shall be finally disposed of.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. If I may make an inquiry, does the Senator from New Jersey desire to amend the House bill?

Mr. KEAN. No; I desire to amend the Senate bill.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. But that has already been agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The committee amendment, which stood in the same attitude as an original bill so far as amendments are concerned, has already been agreed to as amended. It will be open to further amendment on the motion to substitute the language already agreed to for the provisions of the House bill.

Mr. McNARY. That is the thought I had in mind. It does not preclude the Senator from New Jersey from still offering an amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Not at all. It still has the status of an amendment. The Senator from Florida has moved that the language of the Senate bill be substituted for the language of the House bill. That leaves it open to amendment at this time; it cannot be amended after the Senate bill shall have been substituted for the House bill.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I inquire, Mr. President, if there is an amendment now pending.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is not.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I send to the desk an amendment and ask that it may be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota to the amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 54, line 3, after the word "association", it is proposed to insert "farmers' cooperative association as defined in paragraphs 12, 13, and 14, section 103, of the Revenue Act of 1932."

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I do not believe the farmers' cooperative associations will be issuing securities; but I am inclined to think, if they should do so, they would be glad to have them registered. I do not, however, object to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Jersey desire to offer an amendment?

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, the only question that I should like to call to the attention of the Senate is this: On page 34 of the bill there is a requirement that three fourths of all the directors of a corporation shall sign the registration statement.

This provision is taken from the English Companies Act. Directors under the English Companies Act are really responsible and do the detail work of the corporation. They receive as salary from a thousand to two thousand or three thousand pounds a year. Here, however, we are trying to bind people who receive but $5 or $10 a month in the same way that it is proposed to bind men who receive $10,000 a year. It seems to me that the responsibility of the directors is different in the two cases. Nobody is going to be a director of a corporation if he is compelled to assume a liability, amounting perhaps to $10,000,000, for something about which he does not know, when he receives perhaps only $10 a month. I should like to limit the responsibility of the directors so that the bill would apply to them only when they knowingly commit fraud. If they knowingly commit fraud, the greatest penalty the Senate can impose upon them is not too great for me; but to provide when they sign the statement and not knowingly commit fraud that they shall be liable for ten or fifteen million dollars, although they receive fees of but $10 a month, it seems to be perfectly absurd.

Insistence upon the officers of a corporation signing the statement is perfectly proper. They are in charge of the business; they are responsible for the statement; and, if they make a false statement, they ought to be liable for it; but, in my opinion, that is not true of the directors.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Has the Senator from New Jersey offered any amendment?

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, let me say that the committee considered the suggestion of the Senator from New Jersey very carefully, and, after considerable discussion about it, agreed, if the public is to be protected, that we had better leave the language as it is. The liability provision reads, in part:

In case any such registration statement shall be false or deceptive in any material respect, any persons acquiring any securities to which such statement relates, either from the original issuer or from any other person, shall have the right to rescind the transaction and to obtain the return, either at law or in equity, of any and all consideration given or paid for any such securities upon the surrender thereof.

That is the liability which everybody signing the registration statement assumes, and I think it ought to remain that way. I think that is the only basis on which we can make the proposed act effective.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, may I ask in what part of the bill is the responsibility set forth? I have not had time to study it.

Mr. KEAN. The provision to which I refer is on page 34.

Mr. SMITH. I refer to the responsibility placed upon the directors.

Mr. FLETCHER. That is found on page 50.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Florida.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, in order to bring the question directly before the Senate I move, on page 34, line 3, to strike out the words "and the directors, trustees, and managers; or, if there is no board of directors, by the persons or board having the power of management of the person."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, would it be possible to have an explanation of the essential differences between the House bill and the Senate bill as amended?

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, it is a long story, and we have been over it, I will say to the Senator, during his absence. We discussed the differences this morning. It would be quite difficult to point out all the differences. Mainly the purposes and objects of both bills are the same, and they will accomplish very much the same thing. There are some features in the House bill which are not in the Senate bill; for instance, one provision in the House bill is that 30 days must elapse before securities can issue after registration has been made. We think that that ties matters up indefinitely and would operate badly upon all business transactions of this kind.

Then there is another provision about the revocation of the permit. The House bill provides for a stop order instead of a revocation. There is not a great deal of difference in that.

There is another provision in the House bill, section 18, which provides for recognizing all the laws of the different States, which would somewhat complicate matters. We have not that provision in the Senate bill. That was the basis of the minority report of the House. It is not in the Senate bill. In the main the principles and purposes are the same.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Florida to substitute the Senate bill as amended for the language of the House bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the amendment be engrossed and the bill read a third time?

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, has the bill been explained to the Senate?

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, it has been explained several times in detail.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the third reading and passage of the bill.

The bill was read the third time and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That this act shall be known as the "Securities Act."

TITLE I

Sec. 2. When used in this act the following terms shall, unless the text otherwise indicates, include the following respective meanings:

Sec. 3. Until securities shall have been registered with the Commission by filing the registration statement hereinafter referred to in accordance with the terms and conditions provided by this act and by the rules and regulations promulgated pursuant thereto, or if such registration has been revoked or suspended as hereinafter provided, it shall be unlawful for—

(a) Any person to make use of the United States mails to sell or offer for sale any such securities in interstate commerce, or to solicit or accept offers to buy such securities in such commerce;

(b) Or for any person to advertise for sale or sell or offer to sell or to solicit or accept an offer to buy any such securities in interstate commerce through the use or medium of any book, magazine, newspaper, or similar publication, or by any circular, advertisement, or printed, written, or other graphic communication or document, or by any spoken communication carried or transmitted through or by such mails or by radio, telegraph, or telephone, or by other means or instruments of transportation or communication, or any of them;

(d) Or for any person to sell or offer for sale or to announce or advertise or deliver in the United States any such securities when the same are securities of a foreign government or a political subdivision thereof.

Sec. 4. All securities heretofore referred to in section 3 of this act shall be registered with the Commission under the terms and conditions hereinafter provided, by filing a registration statement signed by the issuer or issuers, its or their principal executive officers or officers, the principal financial officer or officers, and the directors, trustees, or managers; or, if there is no board of directors, by the persons or board having the power of management of the person, corporation, association, or other entity issuing the said securities: Provided, That when such statement relates to securities issued by a foreign government or political subdivision thereof, or by any person residing in or by any corporation or association organized under the laws of any foreign country, it shall be signed by the person or persons negotiating the loan in the United States or territory or acting as the fiscal or selling agent for the sale of such security in the United States or territory or underwriting such security for sale in the United States or territory, and by the principal executive officers, principal financial officers, and the directors or other managing officials of such person or persons.

Any director of a corporation may, in the discretion of the Commission, and upon request before registration, for good cause shown, be excused from signing and swearing to the said statement: Provided, That the said statement shall not be deemed to have met the requirements of this act and shall not be received by the Commission unless it is signed and sworn to by not less than three fourths of the directors. Signatures of all such persons when printed on the said statements shall be presumed to be so printed by authority of the person whose signature is so affixed, and the burden of proof, in the event such authority shall be denied, shall be upon the party denying same. If any signer of any registration statement shall act therein as a "dummy" he shall state after his signature that he signs as a "dummy" and shall state who such signers' principal or principals are. In the case of signature of any registration statement by one who is shown to be a "dummy" for another, such signature shall not be deemed to be valid for the purposes of this act unless and until the principal of the said "dummy" shall also affix his signature to the said statement. The affixing of any signature without the authority of the purported signer shall constitute a violation of this act. Similar statements shall be filed for each subsequent issue of securities, unless otherwise exempted by this act, not covered by the original and succeeding statements.

(10) Such additional pertinent information as the Commission may require.

(d) The filing of the statement specified in subsections (a) and (b) of this section and the payment of the fee hereinafter provided shall constitute formal registration of the security concerned.

(e) At the time of filing the said statement, as hereinbefore prescribed in subsections (a) and (b) of this section, the applicant shall pay to the Commission a fee of one hundredth of 1 percent of the aggregate par value of the securities to be sold and for which the applicant is seeking registration, but in no case shall such fee be less than $25. In case of stock having no par value the price at which such stock is to be offered to the public shall be deemed to be the par value of such stock.

SEC. 6. The Commission may revoke or suspend the registration of any security by entering an order to that effect if the Commission shall find that any such issuer or any other person who has signed or who is by this act required to sign the registration statement—

(a) Has violated any of the provisions of this act, or any authorized order of the Commission of which such person or issuer has notice, but the burden of proof shall be on the person or persons asserting lack of notice; or

(b) Has been or is engaged or is about to engage in fraudulent transactions, or has filed with the Commission any application, registration, or other statement, or report which is untrue in any material respect or fails to disclose any material information required by section 5 hereof; or

(c) Has made any fraudulent, false, or deceptive representations in any prospectus or in any circular or other literature or communication that has been distributed, or by any other means, concerning such issuer or person or securities registered. Such revocation or suspension shall not apply to any part of an issue of securities that prior to the date of such revocation or suspension shall have been issued, sold, and delivered to a bona-fide purchaser or purchasers for value, without notice, such purchaser or purchasers not being the issuers or underwriters or their agents, representatives, or assigns.

The Commission is hereby directed and empowered to make such examinations and investigations as in its discretion it may deem necessary to the administration or enforcement of this act. In making such examinations or investigations the Commission or any officer or officers designated by it shall at all reasonable times have access to and may compel the production of all the books and papers of issuers, representatives, or underwriters, or any other person or persons being investigated or proceeded against, or having relevant or pertinent knowledge or information touching the matter in question, and may administer oaths to and examine the officers of such issuers, representatives, underwriters, or other persons connected therewith as to its or their business and affairs and, in addition, the Commission may, in its discretion, require the production of a balance sheet exhibiting the assets and liabilities of any issuer, representative, or underwriter, or its or their income statement, or both.

Whenever the Commission may deem it necessary, it may also require such balance sheet or income statement, or both, to be made more specific in such particulars as the Commission shall point out or to be brought down to the latest practicable date.

If any issuer, representative, underwriter, or other entity shall refuse to permit an examination to be made by the Commission, such refusal shall be proper ground for revocation or suspension of registration.

If the Commission shall deem it necessary, it may enter an order requiring an immediate showing of the right to sell securities, and upon failure of the person in whom such right has been reposed to make a satisfactory showing, and an order entered to that effect, such right shall be suspended. Notice of the entry of such orders may be served by mail, or personally, or by telephone confirmed in writing, or by telegraph.

The issuer or other applicant for registration shall on application to the Commission within 30 days from the entry of an order of revocation or suspension be entitled to a public hearing before the Commission or an examiner of the Commission thereunto duly authorized by it, and appropriate records shall be kept of all such hearings and proceedings. If the issuer or other person fails to make such application for a hearing within 30 days after the entry of the Commission's order, such order shall become final.

Sec. 7. Any person aggrieved by an order of the Commission revoking or suspending the registration of any security may obtain a review of such order in the Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States, within any circuit wherein such person resides or carries on business, or in the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia, by filing in the court, within 30 days after such order shall become final, a written petition praying that the order of the Commission be set aside. A copy of such petition shall be forthwith served upon the Commission, and thereupon the Commission shall certify and file in the court a transcript of the record upon which the order complained of was entered. Any findings which the Commission may make as to the facts, if supported by evidence, shall be conclusive. Upon said transcript the court shall have the power to make and enter a decree affirming, modifying, or setting aside the order of the Commission. If either party shall apply to the court for leave to adduce additional evidence, and shall show to the satisfaction of the court that such additional evidence is material and that there were reasonable grounds for failure to adduce such evidence in the hearing before the Commission, the court may order such additional evidence to be taken before the Commission and to be adduced upon the hearing in such manner and upon such terms and conditions as to the court may seem proper. The Commission may modify its findings as to the facts by reason of the additional evidence so taken, and it shall file such modified or new findings, which, if supported by the evidence, shall be conclusive, and its recommendation, if any, for the modification or setting aside of the original order, with the return of such additional evidence. The judgment and decree of the court shall be final, except that the same shall be subject to review by the Supreme Court upon certiorari or certification as provided in sections 240 and 348 of the Judicial Code, as amended.

Sec. 8. It shall be unlawful to carry, transmit, or cause to be carried or transmitted, in interstate commerce, by use of the United States mails or by any means or instruments of transportation or communication, any written, printed, or other graphic communication or document, or any radio communication, announcing, offering, or advertising for sale any securities subject to the provisions of this act, unless such communication or document contains the following information concerning the security so offered:

(a) The name of the issuer and names of the underwriting syndicate, if any, amount of capitalization authorized and paid up, location of principal place of business, and, if incorporated, place of incorporation.

(b) A brief description of the security offered, including the amount of the issue, a description of its rights with reference to dividends or fixed returns and voting power and relative position with reference to other outstanding securities having prior rights which must be specified as well as the amount of capital stock and other securities, commissions, discounts, rebates, and bonuses.

(c) The price at which it is offered to the public, the net amount to be returned to capital investment, and the net amount received or to be received thereafter by the issuer, as well as the maximum amount of discount, rebate, commission, or other form of remuneration to be paid in cash or otherwise, directly or indirectly, for or in connection with the sale or offering for sale of such securities.

(d) The owner of the property constituting the basis of the issue.

(e) A statement showing—

(1) The issuer's assets and liabilities.

(2) Profits and losses during year immediately preceding the offering.

(f) A statement to the effect that additional information may be secured from the Federal Trade Commission at Washington, D.C.: Provided, That in any case where by reason of limited size of such written, printed, or other graphic or radio communications, it is impracticable to set forth all the foregoing information, there shall be set forth such parts thereof or such other information as the Commission may by rules or regulations prescribe in the interest of the protection of the public and for the prevention of false or deceptive representations in the offer for sale or sale of such securities in interstate commerce or by use of the mails: Provided further, That any written, printed, or other graphic communication or document, or any radio communication, announcing, offering, or advertising for sale any securities offered by a foreign government or political subdivision thereof shall contain such information of the character referred to in the registration statement, or such additional information, as the Commission may prescribe by rules or regulations in the interest of the protection of the public and for the prevention of false or deceptive representations in the offer for sale or sale of such securities in interstate commerce or by use of the mails.

The information referred to in this section, when written, printed, or otherwise graphically expressed, shall be placed in a conspicuous part of all communications, documents, or other literature describing or mentioning the securities advertised or offered for sale. Copies of all such written or printed or other graphic communications or documents, as well as transcripts of all radio advertising, referring to the sale of securities subject to the provisions of this section shall, before distribution of such communications to prospective purchasers is begun, be filed with the commission together with a reference to the original registration of the securities so offered.

A statement containing the information required by this section shall also be delivered to each purchaser with the delivery of the security or securities to which it relates, whenever the security is sold by the issuer, or by his or its agents or representatives.

The information required under the provisions of this act contained in all registration or other statements, copies, prospectuses, advertisements, circular letters, and communications, and other documents shall be made available to the public under such regulations as the Commission may prescribe.

Sec. 9. Every person acquiring any securities specified in such statement and offered to the public shall be presumed to rely upon the representations set forth in the said statement. In case any such registration statement shall be false or deceptive in any material respect, any persons acquiring any securities to which such statement relates, either from the original issuer or from any other person, shall have the right to rescind the transaction and to obtain the return, either at law or in equity, of any and all consideration given or paid for any such securities upon the surrender thereof, either from any vendor knowing of such falsity or from the persons signing such statement, jointly or severally. Every person acquiring any security by reason of any false or deceptive representation made in the course of or in connection with a sale or an offer for sale or distribution of such securities shall have the right to recover any and all damages suffered by reason of such acquisition of such securities from the person or persons signing, issuing, using, or causing, directly or indirectly, such false or deceptive representation, jointly or severally: Provided, That any suit, action, or proceeding under this section against a corporation or other person may be brought not only in the judicial district whereof such corporation or person is an inhabitant, but also in any district wherein such corporation or person may be found or transacts business, and without respect to the amount in controversy; but no such suit, action, or proceeding shall be brought after the expiration of 5 years after the date of the sale by the issuer or underwriter, except that in the case of a false or deceptive representation made in the course of or in connection with a sale or offer for sale or distribution of such securities, such suit, action, or proceeding shall not be brought after the expiration of 5 years after the date such false or deceptive representation was made. All process in such suits, actions, or proceedings may be served in the district whereof such corporation or person is an inhabitant or wherever such corporation or person may be found. Any condition, stipulation, or provision binding any person acquiring any of the securities offered to the public to waive compliance with any of the provisions of this act, or of the rules and regulations, or of any requirement of the Commission herein provided for, or purporting to affect such person with notice of any contract, document, or matter not specifically referred to in the statement filed with respect to such securities as herein provided, shall be void. The rights and remedies herein provided for shall be in addition to any and all other rights and remedies that may exist at law or in equity.

Sec. 10. It shall be unlawful for any person to represent or cause to be represented to any prospective purchaser, either orally or in any written or printed communication, circular, advertisement, or other literature, that either registration of securities with the Commission or omission by the Commission to revoke or suspend said registration constitutes or is evidence of the Commission's approval or recommendation of such securities.

Sec. 11. Except as hereinafter otherwise expressly provided, the provisions of this act shall not apply to any of the following classes of securities:

(a) Any security issued or guaranteed by the United States or any Territory or insular possession thereof, or by the District of Columbia or by any State of the United States or political subdivision or agency or instrumentality of any State or States.

(b) Any security issued by and representing an interest in or a direct obligation of any common carrier subject to regulation or supervision as to the issue of its securities or its accounts by a commission, board, or officers of the Government of the United States; or any such security issued by any national bank; or by any corporation created and controlled by and acting as an instrumentality of the Government of the United States pursuant to authority granted by the Congress of the United States: Provided, That nothing in this act shall relieve any of the organizations mentioned in this subsection from submitting to the respective supervisory units of the Government of the United States, in such manner and form as may be required by the respective units, all information, reports, or other documents that are required under the provisions of section 5 of this act, and such additional information, reports, and documents as are now or may hereafter be required by other acts of Congress or by rules and regulations pursuant thereto of the respective units: And provided further, That all such organizations mentioned in this subsection shall nevertheless be required to comply with the provisions of section 8 of this act.

(c) Any security issued by a corporation organized exclusively for religious, educational, benevolent, fraternal, charitable, or reformatory purposes and not for pecuniary profit, and no part of the net earnings of which inures to the benefit of any person, private stockholder, or individual.

(e) Any security issued by a building and loan association, cooperative bank, homestead association, or savings and loan association, farmers' cooperative associations as defined in paragraphs 12, 13, and 14, section 103 of the Revenue Act of 1932, or any annuity contract or optional annuity contract issued by a corporation and payable in installments: Provided, That the foregoing exemption shall not apply with respect to any security or annuity or optional annuity contract issued by any such association, cooperative bank, or corporation which charges in connection with any transaction entrance, admission, or withdrawal fees (including charges for paid-in surplus) exceeding in the aggregate 2 percent of the par value of its securities involved in such transaction, or which sells its securities at a price in excess of their par value, or which issues surplus certificates or like instruments of any kind.

(f) Any securities issued, sold, and delivered to any bona fide purchaser or purchasers, not being the underwriter, selling agent, representative, or assign of the issuer, prior to the date of the approval of this act: Provided, That this exemption shall not apply in the case of a sale or offer for sale, by an owner or dealer, through any prospectus, circular, pamphlet, or other advertising medium, of such securities having an aggregate par value (or, if they have no par value, an aggregate stated or assigned value) of more than $100,000, and whether such sale or offer for sale is made as one transaction or a series of transactions, except that in any such case the registration statement required under this act shall consist of a statement signed by the owner (or, in the case of a sale or offer for sale by a dealer, by the owner and the dealer) containing a copy of such prospectus, circular, pamphlet, or other advertisement, together with the name of the legal and beneficial owners of such securities, and such information affecting or relating to the value of such securities as the Commission may require in the interest of the protection of the public.

(g) Any security issued by or representing an interest in or a direct obligation of any Federal Reserve bank.

Sec. 12. Except as hereinafter otherwise expressly provided, the provisions of this act shall not apply to any of the following transactions:

(d) Any preliminary negotiations between the issuers, underwriters, or other persons necessary to preparing an issue of securities for registration under this act or for sale to the public after registration.

Sec. 13. It shall be unlawful for any person, firm, corporation, or other entity, directly or indirectly, in any interstate sale, promotion, negotiation, advertisement, or distribution of any securities willfully to employ any device, scheme, or artifice or to employ any "dummy", or to act as any such "dummy", with the intent to defraud or to obtain money or property by means of any false pretense, representation, or promise, or to engage in any transaction, practice, or course of business relating to the interstate purchase or sale of any securities which operates or would operate as a fraud upon the purchaser. The director or other person for whom any "dummy" shall act shall be held responsible under this act for any unlawful conduct by such "dummy": Provided, That the said "dummy" shall not be deemed discharged from any liability for any unlawful conduct under this act. It shall be unlawful for any person who is a "dummy" for another to sign a registration statement without disclosing his principal or principals.

Whenever it shall appear to the Commission, either upon complaint or otherwise, that the provisions of this section have been or are about to be violated, it may, in its discretion, either require or permit such person, firm, corporation, association, or other entity to file with it a statement in writing, under oath, or otherwise, as to all the facts and circumstances concerning the subject matter which it believes to be in the public interest to investigate, and may investigate such facts. Whenever it shall appear to the Commission that the practices investigated constitute a fraud or an attempt to defraud under the provisions of this section, or that any person is engaged or is about to engage in interstate commerce in securities without complying with the provisions of this act and the rules and regulations promulgated by the Commission pursuant thereto, or in violation of any such provisions, rules, or regulations, the Commission may, in its discretion, bring an action in the proper district court of the United States to enjoin such practices, transactions, or violations, which injunction upon a proper showing shall be granted without bond, and the Commission shall transmit such evidence as may be available concerning the transaction or facts complained of to the Attorney General, who may, in his discretion, institute the necessary criminal proceeding under section 16 of this act. The exemptions contained in sections 11 and 12 of this act shall not apply to the provisions of this section.

Sec. 14. (a) The Commission shall have authority, from time to time, to make, amend, and rescind rules and regulations for the purpose of executing this act. It shall have authority to prescribe forms upon which all statements to be filed as hereinbefore provided shall be made, and to require such further or supplemental data or information as it may deem proper in the public interest to be included in or from time to time filed in conjunction with the said statements. Such rules and regulations shall be effective upon publication in the manner which the Commission shall prescribe.

(b) For the purpose of all investigations or inquiries which, in the opinion of the Commission, are necessary and proper for the enforcement of this act, the Commission and any officer or officers designated by it are empowered to hold hearings, receive evidence, and subpoena witnesses, examine them under oath and require the production of any books, papers, or other documents which the Commission deems relevant or material to the investigation or inquiry. Such attendance of witnesses, and the production of such documentary evidence, may be required from any place in the United States or any Territory, at any designated place of hearing.

Sec. 15. The District Courts of the United States, the District Courts of Alaska, Hawaii, Puerto Rico, Canal Zone, and the Virgin Islands, and the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia shall have jurisdiction of offenses and violations under this act and under the rules and regulations promulgated by the Commission in respect thereto; and of all suits in equity and actions at law brought under this act. Judgments and decrees so rendered shall be subject to review as provided in sections 128 and 240 of the Judicial Code, as amended (U.S.C., title 28, secs. 225 and 345).

In case of contumacy or refusal to obey a subpoena issued to any corporation or other person, any of the courts heretofore named in this section within the jurisdiction of which the corporation or other person guilty of contumacy or refusal to obey resides or carries on business, may issue an order requiring such corporation or other person to appear before the Commission, or one of its examiners designated by it, there to produce documentary evidence if so ordered, or there to give evidence touching the matter in question; and any failure to obey any such order of the court may be punished by said court as a contempt thereof.

Upon application of the Attorney General of the United States, at the request of the Commission, the said courts shall have jurisdiction to issue writs of mandamus commanding any person or corporation to comply with the provisions of this act or any order of the Commission made in pursuance thereof.

Sec. 16. Any person who shall willfully violate any of the provisions of this act, or the rules and regulations promulgated by the Commission pursuant thereto, shall upon conviction be fined not more than $5,000, or imprisoned not more than 5 years, or both, and any officer, director, or agent, or any corporation who knowingly participates in such violation shall be punished by a like fine or imprisonment, or both.

Sec. 17. The necessary appropriations for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act are hereby authorized. All moneys derived from the fees imposed by the provisions of this act shall be paid into the Treasury to the credit of miscellaneous receipts.

Sec. 18. If any provisions of this act, or the application of such provision to any person or circumstance, shall be held invalid, the remainder of this act, or the application of such provisions to persons or circumstances other than those as to which it is held invalid, shall not be affected thereby.

TITLE II

SEC. 201. For the purpose of protecting, conserving, and advancing the interests of the holders of foreign securities in default, there is hereby created a body corporate with the name "Corporation of Foreign Security Holders" (herein called the "Corporation"). The principal office of the Corporation shall be located in the District of Columbia, but there may be established agencies or branch offices in any city or cities of the United States under rules and regulations prescribed by the board of directors.

SEC. 202. The control and management of the Corporation shall be vested in a board of 12 directors, who shall be appointed and hold office in the following manner: As soon as practicable after the date this act takes effect the Commission shall appoint 12 directors, and shall designate a chairman and a vice chairman from among their number. After the directors designated as chairman and vice chairman cease to be directors their successors as chairman and vice chairman shall be elected by the board of directors itself. Of the directors first appointed, four shall continue in office for a term of 2 years, four for a term of 4 years, and four for a term of 6 years from the date this act takes effect, the term of each to be designated by the Commission at the time of appointment. Their successors shall be appointed by the Commission, each for a term of 6 years from the date of the expiration of the term for which his predecessor was appointed, except that any person appointed to fill a vacancy occurring prior to the expiration of the term for which his predecessor was appointed shall be appointed only for the unexpired term of such predecessor. No person shall be eligible to serve as a director who within the 5 years preceding has had any interest, direct or indirect, in any corporation, company, partnership, bank, or association which has sold or offered to sell any foreign securities. The office of a director shall be vacated if the board of directors shall at a meeting specially convened for that purpose by resolution passed by a majority of at least three fourths of the board of directors, remove such member from office, provided that the member whom it is proposed to remove shall have 7 days' notice sent to him of such meeting and that he may be heard.

SEC. 203. The Corporation shall have power to adopt, alter, and use a corporate seal; to make contracts; to lease such real estate as may be necessary for the transaction of its business; to sue and be sued, to complain and to defend, in any court of competent jurisdiction, State or Federal; to require from trustees, financial agents, or dealers in foreign securities information relative to the original or present holders of foreign securities and such other information as may be required and to issue subpoenas therefor; to take over the functions of any fiscal and paying agents of any foreign securities in default; to borrow money for the purposes as this title, and to pledge as collateral for such loans any securities deposited with the Corporation pursuant to this title; by and with the consent and approval of the Commission to select, employ, and fix the compensation of officers, directors, members of the committees, employees, attorneys, and agents of the Corporation, without regard to the provisions of other laws applicable to the employment and compensation of officers or employees of the United States; to define their authority and duties, require bonds of them and fix the penalties thereof, and to dismiss at pleasure such officers, employees, attorneys, and agents; and to prescribe, amend, and repeal, by its board of directors, bylaws, rules, and regulations governing the manner in which its general business may be conducted and the powers granted to it by law may be exercised and enjoyed, together with provisions for such committees and the functions thereof as the board of directors may deem necessary for facilitating its business under this title. The board of directors of the Corporation shall determine and prescribe the manner in which its obligations shall be incurred and its expenses allowed and paid.

SEC. 204. The board of directors may—

- (1) Convene meetings of holders of foreign securities.
- (2) Invite the deposit and undertake the custody of foreign securities which have defaulted in the payment either of principal or interest, and issue receipts or certificates in the place of securities so deposited.
- (3) Appoint committees from the directors of the Corporation and bar all other persons to represent holders of any class or classes of foreign securities which have defaulted in the payment either of principal or interest, and determine and regulate the functions of such committees. The chairman and vice chairman of the board of directors shall be ex officio chairman and vice chairman of each committee.
- (4) Negotiate and carry out, or assist in negotiating and carrying out, arrangements for the resumption of payments due or in arrears in respect of any foreign securities in default, or for rearranging the terms on which such securities may in future be held, or for converting and exchanging the same for new securities, or for any other object in relation thereto; and under this paragraph any plan or agreement made with respect to such securities shall be binding upon depositors, providing that the consent of holders resident in the United States of 60 percent of the securities deposited with the Corporation shall be obtained.
- (5) Undertake, superintend, or take part in the collection and application of funds derived from foreign securities which come into the possession of or under the control or management of the Corporation.

(6) Collect, preserve, publish, circulate, and render available in readily accessible form, when deemed essential or necessary, documents, statistics, reports, and information of all kinds in respect of foreign securities, including particularly records of foreign external securities in default and records of the progress made toward the payment of past-due obligations.

(7) Take such steps as it may deem expedient with the view of securing the adoption of clear and simple forms of foreign securities and just and sound principles in the conditions and terms thereof.

(8) Generally, act in the name and on behalf of the holders of foreign securities the care or representation of whose interests may be entrusted to the Corporation; conserve and protect the rights and interests of holders of foreign securities issued, sold, or owned in the United States; adopt measures for the protection, vindication, and preservation or reservation of the rights and interests of holders of foreign securities either on any default in or on breach or contemplated breach of the conditions on which such foreign securities may have been issued, or otherwise; obtain for such holders such legal and other assistance and advice as the board of directors may deem expedient; and do all such other things as are incident or conducive to the attainment of the above objects.

SEC. 205. The board of directors shall cause accounts to be kept of all matters relating to or connected with the transactions and business of the Corporation, and cause a general account and balance sheet of the Corporation to be made out in each year, and cause all accounts to be audited by one or more auditors who shall examine the same and report thereon to the board of directors.

SEC. 206. The Corporation shall make, print, and make public an annual report of its operations during each year, send a copy thereof, together with a copy of the account and balance sheet and auditor's report, to the Commission and to both Houses of Congress, and provide one copy of such report but not more than one on the application of any person and on receipt of a sum not exceeding $1: Provided, That the board of directors in its discretion may distribute copies gratuitously.

SEC. 207. The Corporation may in its discretion levy charges, assessed on a prorata basis, on the holders of foreign securities deposited with it: Provided, That any charge levied at the time of depositing securities with the Corporation shall not exceed one fifth of 1 percent of the face value of such securities: Provided further, That any additional charges shall bear a close relationship to the cost of operations and negotiations, including those enumerated in sections 203 and 204, and shall not exceed 1 percent of the face value of such securities.

SEC. 208. The Corporation may receive subscriptions from any person, foundation with a public purpose, or agency of the United States Government, and except that such subscriptions may, in the discretion of the board of directors, be treated as loans repayable when and as the board of directors shall determine.

SEC. 209. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is hereby authorized to loan out of its funds not to exceed $75,000 for the use of the Corporation.

SEC. 210. This title may be cited as the "Corporation of Foreign Bondholders Act, 1933."

SEC. 19. This act shall take effect 90 days after its approval.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida desire the title of the bill changed in accordance with the language of the Senate text?

Mr. FLETCHER. I have no objection to using the House title.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Senate bill (S. 875) to provide for the furnishing of information and supervision of traffic in investment securities in interstate commerce will be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I move that the Senate insist upon its amendment, ask for a conference with the House on the bill and amendment, and that the Chair appoint conferees.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. FLETCHER, Mr. GLASS, Mr. WAGNER, Mr. NORBECK, and Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH conferees on the part of the Senate.

RADIO DECISION BY UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, during the last session the senior Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL] made some reference on the floor to a decision of the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia in a radio case. I also on the floor made reference to the same case. The Supreme Court of the United States has just handed down a decision determinative of the issues involved in that case. The decision is of so much importance to those interested in radio communication that I ask that it may be printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the decision was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

Nos. 657, 658, 659, and 660—October term 1932

(657) FEDERAL RADIO COMMISSION, PETITIONER, v. NELSON BROS. BOND & MORTGAGE CO. (STATION WIBO). (658) FEDERAL RADIO COMMISSION, PETITIONER, v. NORTH SHORE CHURCH (STATION WPCC). (659) FEDERAL RADIO COMMISSION AND JOHNSON-KENNEDY RADIO CORPORATION (STATION WJKS), PETITIONERS, v. NELSON BROS. BOND & MORTGAGE CO. (STATION WIBO). (660) FEDERAL RADIO COMMISSION AND JOHNSON-KENNEDY RADIO CORPORATION (STATION WJKS), PETITIONERS, v. NORTH SHORE CHURCH (STATION WPCC). ON WRITS OF CERTIORARI TO THE COURT OF APPEALS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. Chief Justice Hughes delivered the opinion of the Court.

The Johnson-Kennedy Radio Corporation, owning station WJKS at Gary, Ind., applied to the Federal Radio Commission for modification of license so as to permit operation, with unlimited time, on the frequency of 560 kilocycles, then assigned for the use of station WIBO, owned by Nelson Bros. Bond & Mortgage Co., and station WPCC, owned by the North Shore Church, both at Chicago, Ill. These owners appeared before the chief examiner who, after taking voluminous testimony, recommended that the application be denied. The applicant filed exceptions and, on consideration of the evidence, the Commission granted the application and directed a modified license to issue to the applicant authorizing the operation of station WJKS on the frequency of 560 kilocycles and terminating the existing licenses theretofore issued for stations WIBO and WPCC. On appeal, the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia reversed the Commission's decision upon the ground that it was "in a legal sense arbitrary and capricious" (62 F. (2d) 854). This Court granted certiorari (288 U.S. —).

The action of the Commission was taken under section 9 of the Radio Act of 1927 (c. 169, 44 Stat. 1166), as amended by section 5 of the act of March 28, 1928 (ch. 263, 45 Stat. 373; 47 U.S.C. 89). The findings of fact upon which the Commission based its order included the following:

"Gary, Ind., about 30 miles from Chicago, is the largest steel center in the world. It has a population of approximately 110,000 and is located in what is known as the Calumet region which has a population of about 800,000, 60 percent of whom are foreign born and represent over 50 nationalities. Station WJKS is the only radio station in Gary, and the programs it broadcasts are well designed to meet the needs of the foreign population. These programs include 'broadcasts for Hungarian, Italian, Mexican, Spanish, German, Russian, Polish, Croatian, Lithuanian, Scotch, and Irish people', and 'are musical, educational, and instructive in their nature and stress loyalty to the community and the Nation.' Programs are arranged and supervised 'to stimulate community and racial origin pride and rivalry and to instruct in citizenship and American ideals and responsibilities.' 'Special accident prevention talks' are given for workmen, explaining the application of new safeguards of various types of machinery used in the steel mills. The children's hour utilizes selections from various schools. There are 'good-citizenship talks' weekly by civic leaders. The facilities of the station are made available to the local police department and to all fraternal, charitable, and religious organizations in the Calumet region, without charge. Sunday programs consist mainly 'of church service broadcasts' including all churches and denominations desiring to participate. Although the Calumet area is served by a station at Fort Wayne and by several stations in Chicago, station WJKS 'is the only station which serves a substantial portion of the area with excellent or even good service.' While station WJKS 'delivers a signal of sufficient strength to give good reception in its normal service area if not interfered with, heterodyne and cross-talk interference exist to within 3 miles of the transmitter and constant

"Sec. 5. The second paragraph of section 9 of the Radio Act of 1927 is amended to read as follows:

"It is hereby declared that the people of all the zones established by section 2 of this act are entitled to equality of radio broadcasting service, both of transmission and of reception, and in order to provide said equality the licensing authority shall as nearly as possible make and maintain an equal allocation of broadcasting licenses, of bands of frequency or wave lengths, of periods of time for operation, and of station power, to each of said zones when and insofar as there are applications therefor; and shall make a fair and equitable allocation of licenses, wave lengths, time for operation, and station power to each of the States, the District of Columbia, the Territories, and possessions of the United States within each zone, according to population. The licensing authority shall carry into effect the equality of broadcasting service hereinbefore directed, whenever necessary or proper, by granting or refusing licenses or renewals of licenses, by changing periods of time for operation, and by increasing or decreasing station power, when applications are made for licenses or renewals of licenses: Provided, That if and when there is a lack of applications from any zone for the proportionate share of licenses, wave lengths, time of operation, or station power to which such zone is entitled, the licensing authority may issue licenses for the balance of the proportion not applied for from any zone, to applicants from other zones for a temporary period of 90 days each, and shall specifically designate that said apportionment is only for said temporary period. Allocations shall be charged to the State, District, Territory, or possession wherein the studio of the station is located and not where the transmitter is located."

objection to interference is found in the good-service area of the station, particularly to the south, southeast, and east.' This interference has increased during the past 2 years.

"Station WIBO is operated by Nelson Bros. Bond & Mortgage Co. separately from its mortgage and real-estate business. It employs 55 persons, and its total monthly expenses average $17,000. In March 1931 it earned a net profit of $9,000. It represents a total cost of $346,362.99, less a reserve for depreciation of $54,627.36, and has been operated since April 1925. Station WIBO was licensed to share time with station WPCC, the latter being authorized to operate on Sundays during stated hours and by agreement has operated on certain week days in exchange for Sunday hours.

"The licenses for stations WIBO and WPCC, effective from September 1, 1931, to March 1, 1932, were issued upon the following condition: 'This license is issued on a temporary basis and subject to such action as the Commission may take after hearing on the application filed by station WJKS, Gary, Ind., for the frequency 560 kilocycles. No authority contained herein shall be construed as a finding by the Federal Radio Commission that the operation of this station is or will be in the public interest beyond the term hereof.'

"The programs broadcast by station WIBO include a large number of chain programs originating in the National Broadcasting Network, and are almost entirely commercial in their nature. The same general type of programs broadcast by WIBO, including National Broadcasting Chain programs, are received in the service area of WIBO from many other stations located in the Chicago district.

"Station WPCC, owned by the North Shore Church, has programs made up entirely of sermons, religious music, and talks relating to the work and interests of the church. Contributions are solicited for the use of the church and to advance the matters in which it is interested; it is not used by other denominations or societies. 'Other stations in Chicago, including WMBI, owned by the Moody Bible Institute, devoting more time to programs of a religious nature than WPCC, are received in the service area of that station.'

"The State of Indiana is 2.08 units, or 22 percent, under quota in station assignments, and the State of Illinois is 12.49 units, or 55 percent over quota in such assignments. The fourth zone, in which both States are located, is 21 units, or 26 percent, over quota in station assignments. The granting of this application and deletion of WIBO and WPCC would reduce the over-quota status of the State of Illinois and the fourth zone by 0.88 unit and 0.45 unit, respectively, and would increase the quota of Indiana by 0.43 unit."

"Summarizing the grounds of its decision, the Commission found:

"1. The applicant station (WJKS) now renders an excellent public service in the Calumet region, and the granting of this application would enable that station to further extend and enlarge upon that service.

"2. The deletion of stations WIBO and WPCC would not deprive the persons within the service areas of those stations of any type of programs not now received from other stations.

"3. Objectionable interference is now experienced within the service area of WJKS through the operation of other stations on the same and adjacent frequencies.

"4. The granting of this application and deletion of stations WIBO and WPCC would not increase interference within the good service areas of any other stations.

"5. The granting of this application and deletion of stations WIBO and WPCC would work a more equitable distribution of broadcasting facilities within the fourth zone, in that there would be an increase in the radio broadcasting facilities of Indiana which is now assigned less than its share of such facilities and a decrease in the radio broadcasting facilities of Illinois which is now assigned more than its share of such facilities.

"6. Public interest, convenience, and/or necessity would be served by the granting of this application."

The court of appeals was divided in opinion. The majority pointed out that the court had repeatedly held that "it would not be consistent with the legislative policy to equalize the comparative broadcasting facilities of the various States or zones by unnecessarily injuring stations already established which are rendering valuable service to their natural service areas"; and they were of opinion that the evidence showed that stations WIBO and WPCC had been "serving public interest, convenience, and necessity certainly to as great an extent as the applicant station" and that "the conclusively established and admitted facts" furnished no legal basis for the commission's decision. The minority of the court took the view that the court was substituting its own conclusions for those of the commission, that the commission had acted within its authority, and that its findings were sustained by the evidence.

First Respondents challenge the jurisdiction of this court. They insist that the decision of the court of appeals is not a "judicial judgment"; that, for the purpose of the appeal to it, the Court of Appeals is merely a part of the machinery of the Radio Commission and that the decision of the court is an administrative decision. Respondents further insist that if this court examines the record, its decision "would not be a judgment, or permit of a judgment to be made in any lower court, but would permit only consummation of the administrative function of issuing or withholding a permit to operate the station."

Under section 16 of the Radio Act of 1927, the court of appeals, on appeal from decisions of the Radio Commission, was directed to "hear, review, and determine the appeal" upon the record made before the commission, and upon such additional evidence as the court might receive, and was empowered to "alter or revise the decision appealed from and enter such judgment as to it may seem just" (44 Stat. 1169). This provision made the court "a superior and revising agency" in the administrative field and consequently its decision was not a judicial judgment reviewable by this court. (Federal Radio Commission v. General Electric Co., 281 U.S. 464, 467.) The province of the court of appeals was found to be substantially the same as that which it had, until recently, on appeals from administrative decisions of the Commissioner of Patents. While the Congress can confer upon the courts of the District of Columbia such administrative authority, this court cannot be invested with jurisdiction of that character whether for the purpose of review or otherwise. It cannot give decisions which are merely advisory, nor can it exercise functions which are essentially legislative or administrative. (Id., pp. 468, 469; Keller v. Potomac Electric Power Co., 261 U.S. 428, 442-444; Postum Cereal Co. v. California Fig Nut Co., 272 U.S. 693, 700.)

In the light of the decision in the General Electric case, supra, the Congress, by the act of July 1, 1930, chapter 788, amended section 16 of the Radio Act of 1927 so as to limit the review by the court of appeals (46 Stat. 844; 47 U.S.C. 96).<sup>2</sup> That review is now expressly limited to "questions of law" and it is provided "that findings of fact by the Commission, if supported by substantial evidence, shall be conclusive unless it shall clearly appear that the findings of the Commission are arbitrary or capricious." This limitation is in sharp contrast with the previous grant of authority. No longer is the court entitled to revise the Commission's decision and to enter such judgment as the court may think just. The limitation manifestly demands judicial, as distinguished from administrative, review. Questions of law form the appropriate subject of judicial determinations. Dealing with activities admittedly within its regulatory power, the Congress established the Commission as its instrumentality to provide continuous and expert supervision and to exercise the administrative judgment essential in applying legislative standards to a host of instances. These standards the Congress prescribed. The powers of the Commission were defined, and definition is limitation. Whether the Commission applies the legislative standards validly set up, whether it acts within the authority conferred or goes beyond it, whether its proceedings satisfy the pertinent demands of due process, whether, in short, there is compliance with the legal requirements which fix the province of the Commission and govern its action, are appropriate questions for judicial decision. These are questions of law upon which the court is to pass. The provision that the Commission's findings of fact, if supported by substantial evidence, shall be conclusive unless it clearly appears that the findings are arbitrary or capricious, cannot be regarded as an attempt to vest in the court an authority to revise the action of the Commission from an administrative standpoint and to make an administrative judgment. A finding without substantial evidence to support it—an arbitrary or capricious finding—does violence to the law. It is without the sanction of the authority conferred. And an inquiry into the facts before the Commission, in order to ascertain whether its findings are thus vitiated, belongs to the judicial province and does not trench upon, or involve the exercise of, administrative authority. Such an examination is not concerned with the weight of evidence or with the wisdom or expediency of the administrative action. (Interstate Commerce Commission v. Illinois Central R.R. Co., 215 U.S. 452, 470; Interstate Commerce Commission v. Union Pacific R.R. Co., 222 U.S. 541, 547, 548; New England Divisions Case, 261 U.S. 184, 203, 204; Keller v. Potomac Electric Power Co., supra; The Chicago Junction Case, 264 U.S. 258, 263, 265; Silberschein v. United States, 266 U.S. 221, 225; Ma-King Products Co. v. Blair, 271 U.S. 479, 483; Federal Trade Commission v. Klesner, 280 U.S. 19, 30; Tagg Bros. v. United States, 280 U.S. 420, 442; Federal Trade Commission v. Raladam Co., 283 U.S. 643, 654; Crowell v. Benson, 285 U.S. 22, 49, 50.)

"At the earliest convenient time the court shall hear and determine the appeal upon the record before it, and shall have power, upon such record, to enter a judgment affirming or reversing the decision of the Commission, and, in event the court shall render a decision and enter an order reversing the decision of the Commission, it shall remand the case to the commission to carry out the judgment of the court: Provided, however, That the review by the court shall be limited to questions of law and that findings of fact by the Commission, if supported by substantial evidence, shall be conclusive unless it shall clearly appear that the findings of the commission are arbitrary or capricious. The court's judgment shall be final, subject, however, to review by the Supreme Court of the United States upon writ of certiorari on petition therefor under sec. 347 of title 28 of the Judicial Code by appellant, by the Commission, or by any interested party intervening in the appeal" (46 Stat. 844; 47 U.S.C. 96).

In reporting this amendment, the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries of the House of Representatives stated: "The purpose of the amendment is to clarify the procedure on appeal to the court from decisions of the Federal Radio Commission, to more clearly define the scope of the subject matter of such appeals, and to insure a review of the decision of the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia by the Supreme Court" (H.Rept. No. 1665, 71st Cong., 2d sess., p. 2).

If the questions of law thus presented were brought before the Court by suit to restrain the enforcement of an invalid administrative order there could be no question as to the judicial character of the proceeding. But that character is not altered by the mere fact that remedy is afforded by appeal. The controlling question is whether the function to be exercised by the Court is a judicial function; and if so, it may be exercised on an authorized appeal from the decision of an administrative body. We must not "be misled by a name but look to the substance and intent of the proceeding". (United States v. Ritchie, 17 How. 525, 534; Stephens v. Cherokee Nation, 174 U.S. 445, 479; Federal Trade Commission v. Eastman Co., 274 U.S. 619, 623; Old Colony Trust Co. v. Commissioner, 279 U.S. 716, 722-724.) "It is not important", we said in Old Colony Trust Co. v. Commissioner, supra, "whether such a proceeding was originally begun by an administrative or executive determination, if when it comes to the court, whether legislative or constitutional, it calls for the exercise of only the judicial power of the court upon which jurisdiction has been conferred by law." Nor is it necessary that the proceeding to be judicial should be one entirely de novo. When on the appeal, as here provided, the parties come before the court of appeals to obtain its decision upon the legal question whether the Commission has acted within the limits of its authority and to have their rights, as established by law, determined accordingly, there is a case or controversy which is the appropriate subject of the exercise of judicial power. The provision that in case the Court reverses the decision of the Commission "it shall remand the case to the Commission to carry out the judgment of the Court" means no more than that the Commission in its further action is to respect and follow the Court's determination of the questions of law. The procedure thus contemplates a judicial judgment by the court of appeals, and this Court has jurisdiction, on certiorari, to review that judgment in order to determine whether or not it is erroneous. (Osborn v. United States Bank, 9 Wheat. 738, 819; In re Pacific Railway Commission, 32 Fed. 241, 255; Federal Trade Commission v. Klesner, supra; Federal Trade Commission v. Raladam Co., supra; Old Colony Trust Co. v. Commissioner, supra.)

Second. In this aspect, the questions presented are (1) whether the Commission, in making allocations of frequencies or wave lengths to States within a zone has power to license operation by a station in an "under-quota" State on a frequency theretofore assigned to a station in an "over-quota" State and to terminate the license of the latter station; (2) whether, if the Commission has this power, its findings of fact sustain its order in the instant case, in the light of the statutory requirements for the exercise of the power; and if so, whether these findings are supported by substantial evidence; and (3) whether, in its procedure, the Commission denied to the respondents any substantial right.

1. No question is presented as to the power of the Congress, in its regulation of interstate commerce, to regulate radio communications. No State lines divide the radio waves, and national regulation is not only appropriate but essential to the efficient use of radio facilities. In view of the limited number of available broadcasting frequencies, the Congress has authorized allocation and licenses. The Commission has been set up as the licensing authority and invested with broad powers of distribution in order to secure a reasonable equality of opportunity in radio transmission and reception.

The Radio Act divides the United States into five zones, and Illinois and Indiana are in the fourth zone. (Sec. 2, 47 U.S.C. 82.) Except as otherwise provided in the act, the Commission "from time to time, as public convenience, interest, or necessity requires", is directed to "assign bands of frequency or wave lengths to the various classes of stations and assign frequencies or wave lengths for each individual station and determine the power which each station shall use and the time during which it may operate", and to "determine the location of classes of stations or individual stations." (Sec. 4 (c) (d), 47 U.S.C. 84.) By section 9, as amended in 1928, the Congress declared that the people of all the zones "are entitled to equality of radio broadcasting service, both of transmission and of reception", and that "in order to provide said equality the licensing authority shall as nearly as possible make and maintain an equal allocation of broadcasting licenses, of bands of frequency or wave lengths, of periods of time for operation, and of station power to each of said zones when and insofar as there are applications therefor"; and the Commission is further directed to "make a fair and equitable allocation of licenses, wave lengths, time for operation, and station power to each of the States, * * * within each zone, according to population"; and the Commission is to "carry into effect the equality of broadcasting service, * * * whenever necessary or proper, by granting or refusing licenses or renewals of licenses, by changing periods of time for operation and by increasing or decreasing station power when applications are made for licenses or renewals of licenses." (Sec. 9, 47 U.S.C. 89.)

By its General Order No. 40, of August 30, 1928<sup>4</sup> the Commission established a basis for the equitable distribution of broadcasting facilities in accordance with the act. That order, as amended, provided for the required apportionment by setting aside a certain number of frequencies for use by stations operating on clear channels for distant service, and other frequencies for simultaneous use by stations operating in different zones, each station serving a regional area, and still others for use by stations serving city or local areas. These three classes of stations have become known as "clear, regional, and local channel stations." A new allocation of frequencies, power, and hours of operation was made in November 1928,<sup>5</sup> to conform to the prescribed classification. It was found to be impracticable to determine the total value of the three classes of assignments so that it could be ascertained whether a State was actually "under or over quota on total radio facilities", and the Commission developed a "unit system" in order "to evaluate stations, based on type of channel, power, and hours of operation, and all other considerations required by law." In June 1930 the Commission issued its General Order No. 92,<sup>6</sup> specifying the "unit value" of stations of various types, and in this way the Commission was able to make a tabulation by zones and States showing the "units due", based on estimated population, and the "units assigned." This action called for administrative judgment, and no ground is shown for assailing it. It appears that, with respect to total broadcasting facilities, Indiana is "under quota" and Illinois is "over quota" in station assignments.

Respondents contend that the Commission has departed from the principle set forth in its General Order No. 92, because it has ignored the fact that, both Indiana and Illinois being under quota in regional station assignments, Indiana has more of such assignments in proportion to its quota than has Illinois, and by ordering the deletion of regional stations in Illinois in favor of an Indiana station, the Commission has violated the command of Congress by increasing the under-quota condition of Illinois in favor of the already superior condition of Indiana with respect to stations of that type. We find in the act no command with the import upon which respondents insist. The command is that there shall be a "fair and equitable allocation of licenses, wave lengths, time for operation, and station power to each of the States within each zone." It cannot be said that this demanded equality between States with respect to every type of station. Nor does it appear that the Commission ignored any of the facts shown by the evidence. The fact that there was a disparity in regional station assignments, and that Indiana had more of this type than Illinois could not be regarded as controlling. In making its "fair and equitable allocations" the Commission was entitled and required to consider all the broadcasting facilities assigned to the respective States, and all the advantages thereby enjoyed, and to determine whether, in view of all the circumstances of distribution, a more equitable adjustment would be effected by the granting of the application of station WJKS and the deletion of stations WIBO and WPCC.

To accomplish its purpose the statute authorized the Commission to effect the desired adjustment "by granting or refusing licenses or renewals of licenses by changing periods of time for operation, and by increasing or decreasing station power." This broad authority plainly extended to the deletion of existing stations if that course was found to be necessary to produce an equitable result. The context, as already observed, shows clearly that the Congress did not authorize the Commission to act arbitrarily or capriciously in making a redistribution, but only in a reasonable manner to attain a legitimate end. That the Congress had the power to give this authority to delete stations, in view of the limited radio facilities available and the confusion that would result from interferences, is not open to question. Those who operated broadcasting stations had no right superior to the exercise of this power of regulation. They necessarily made their investments and their contracts in the light of and subject to this paramount authority. This Court has had frequent occasion to observe that the power of Congress in the regulation of interstate commerce is not fettered by the necessity of maintaining existing arrangements which would conflict with the execution of its policy, as such a restriction would place the regulation in the hands of private individuals and withdraw from the control of Congress so much of the field as they might choose by prophetic discernment to bring within the range of their enterprises. (Union Bridge Co. v. United States, 204 U.S. 364, 400, 401; Philadelphia Co. v. Stimson, 223 U.S. 605, 634, 638; Philadelphia, Baltimore & Washington R. R. Co. v. Schubert, 224 U.S. 603, 613, 614; Greenleaf Lumber Co. v. Garrison, 237 U.S. 251, 260; Continental Insurance Co. v. United States, 259 U.S. 156, 171; *Sproles v. Respondents urge that the Commission has misconstrued the act of Congress by apparently treating allocation between States within a zone as subject to the mandatory direction of the Congress relating to the zones themselves. Respondents say that as to zones Congress requires an "equal" allocation, but as between States only "a fair and equitable" allocation, and that the provision "for granting or refusing licenses or renewals of licenses" relates to the former and not to the latter. It is urged that this construction is fortified by the proviso in section 9 as to temporary permits for zones.<sup>7</sup> We think that this attempted distinction is without basis. The Congress was not seeking in either case

"an exact mathematical division."<sup>8</sup> It was recognized that this might be physically impossible. The equality sought was not a mere matter of geographical delimitation. The concern of the Congress was with the interests of the people—that they might have a reasonable equality of opportunity in radio transmission and reception, and this involved an equitable distribution not only as between zones but as between States as well. And to construe the authority conferred, in relation to the deletion of stations, as being applicable only to an apportionment between zones and not between States, would defeat the manifest purpose of the act.

We conclude that the Commission, in making allocations of frequencies to States within a zone, has the power to license operation by a station in an under-quota State on a frequency theretofore assigned to a station in an over-quota State, provided the Commission does not act arbitrarily or capriciously.

(2) Respondents contend that the deletion of their stations was arbitrary in that they were giving good service, that they had not failed to comply with any of the regulations of the Commission, and that no proceeding had been instituted for the revocation of their licenses as provided in section 14 of the act (47 U.S.C. 94). That section permits revocation of particular licenses by reason of false statements or for failure to operate as the license required or to observe any of the restrictions and conditions imposed by law or by the Commission's regulations. There is, respondents say, no warrant in the act for a "forfeiture" such as that here attempted. But the question here is not with respect to revocation under section 14, but as to the equitable adjustment of allocations demanded by section 9. The question is not simply as to the service rendered by particular stations, independently considered, but as to relative facilities—the apportionment as between States. At the time of the proceeding in question respondents were operating under licenses running from September 1, 1931, to March 1, 1932, and which provided in terms that they were issued "on a temporary basis and subject to such action as the Commission may take after hearing on the application filed by station WJKS" for the frequency 560 kilocycles. Charged with the duty of making an equitable distribution as between States it was appropriate for the Commission to issue temporary licenses with such a reservation in order to preserve its freedom to act in the light of its decision on that application. And when decision was reached there was nothing either in the provisions of section 14 or otherwise in the act which precluded the Commission from terminating the licenses in accordance with the reservation stipulated.

In granting licenses the Commission is required to act "as public convenience, interest, or necessity requires." This criterion is not to be interpreted as setting up a standard so indefinite as to confer an unlimited power. (Compare N. Y. Central securities Co. v. United States, 287 U.S. 12, 24.) The requirement is to be interpreted by its context, by the nature of radio transmission and reception, by the scope, character, and quality of services, and, where an equitable adjustment between States is in view, by the relative advantages in service which will be enjoyed by the public through the distribution of facilities. In making such an adjustment the equities of existing stations undoubtedly demand consideration. They are not to be the victims of official favoritism. But the weight of the evidence as to these equities and all other pertinent facts is for the determination of the Commission in exercising its authority to make a "fair and equitable allocation."

In the instant case the Commission was entitled to consider the advantages enjoyed by the people of Illinois under the assignments to that State, the services rendered by the respective stations, the reasonable demands of the people of Indiana, and the special requirements of radio service at Gary. The Commission's findings show that all these matters were considered. Respondents say that there had been no material change in conditions since the general reallocation of 1928. But the Commission was not bound to maintain that allocation if it appeared that a fair and equitable distribution made a change necessary. Complaint is also made that the Commission did not adopt the recommendations of its examiner. But the Commission had the responsibility of decision and was not only at liberty but was required to reach its own conclusions upon the evidence.

We are of the opinion that the Commission's findings of fact, which we summarized at the outset, support its decision, and an examination of the record leaves no room for doubt that these findings rest upon substantial evidence.

(3) Respondents raise a further question with respect to the procedure adopted by the Commission. In January 1931 the Commission issued its General Order No. 102<sup>9</sup> relating to applications from underquota States. This order provided, among other things, that "applications from underquota States in zones which have already allocated to them their pro rata share of radio facilities should be for a facility already in use in that zone by an overquota State", and that, since the Commission had allocated frequencies for the different classes of stations, "applications should be for frequencies set aside by the Commission for the character of station applied for." Respondents insist that these requirements foreclosed the exercise of discretion by the Commission by permitting the applicant to select the station and the facilities which it desired; that this "naked action of the applicant" precluded the Commission from "giving general consideration to the field" and from making that fair and equitable allocation which is the primary command of the statute. We think that this argument misconstrues General Order No. 102. That order is merely a rule of procedural convenience, requiring the applicant to frame a precise proposal and thus to present a definite issue. The order in no way derogates from the authority of the Commission. While it required the applicant to state the facilities it desires, there was nothing to prevent respondents from contesting the applicant's demand upon the ground that other facilities were available and should be granted in place of those which the applicant designated. If such a contention had been made, there would have been no difficulty in bringing before the Commission other stations whose interests might be drawn in question. There is no showing that the respondents were prejudiced by the operation of the order in question.

Respondents complain that they were not heard in argument before the Commission. They were heard before the examiner, and the evidence they offered was considered by the Commission. The exceptions filed by the applicant to the examiner's report were filed and served upon the respondents in August 1931, and the decision of the Commission was made in the following October. While the request of the applicant for oral argument was denied, it does not appear that any such request was made by respondents or that they sought any other hearing than that which was accorded.

We find no ground for denying effect to the Commission's action. The judgment of the court of appeals is reversed, and the cause is remanded with direction to affirm the decision of the Commission. It is so ordered.

POLICIES FOR AGRICULTURE—ADDRESS BY HENRY MORGENTHAU, JR.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address on Policies for Agriculture, by Henry Morgenthau, Jr., delivered before the round-table conference of the Twenty-first Annual Meeting of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States on May 4, 1933.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The general topic which has been proposed for my discussion this afternoon, that of Policies for Agriculture, covers a broad field. Obviously, within the limits of my time, and of your patience, I cannot attempt to cover it comprehensively. What I propose to do is to merely touch upon some aspects of it that relate to my own experience.

The conditions that have existed for some years past have invited many schemes for the relief of agriculture. This Niagara of proposals for governmental action is just one of the symptoms of general distress. They are evidence of the extreme concern which has spread to all classes of the population as to a condition about which we all should reasonably have grave concern. It should prove valuable to have many minds busying themselves with the problem, but, of course, there is always the danger that an extreme emergency may provoke too much interest in panic suggestions and divert too much of our attention from fundamentals and from consistent efforts to make orderly progress, to correction of detailed evils. Whatever novel and heroic measures we adopt for dealing with an acute emergency there will still be the long task ahead of adjusting agriculture to changing needs, of correcting inequities in financing, in taxation and in marketing methods, of attempting to give some plan and direction to agricultural production, and of planning more satisfactory conditions of rural life.

One of the heavy penalties we have paid in the long and disastrous decline of farm prices has been the interruption of progress along many lines of effort that must be followed through to create a lasting improvement in the conditions that surround agriculture and in farm living conditions. I doubt if it will ever be possible to protect agriculture completely from the results of a general business slump of such magnitude as that we have witnessed within the last few years; but the decline in agriculture preceded the general industrial depression, and when we analyze conditions prevailing 5 to 8 years ago we are able to trace influences that contributed to the agricultural decline. These influences point to the need for long-range planning and indicate ways in which Federal and State Governments, farmers' organizations, and individual farmers can cooperate to remove some of the obstacles to agricultural prosperity.

Agriculture in the United States has undergone a continual process of transformation. In character and distribution, it has changed with every generation. The opening of new lands, changes in industry, changes in consumption demands, and changes in farming methods have all played their part. One of the most profound influences in recent years has been the increased use of modern agricultural machinery, and an even more profound change has been wrought by the general motorizing of transportation.

The use of the truck and automobile has greatly altered the currents of distribution of farm products and has necessarily changed the character of production in many areas. One of the most difficult adjustments has been made necessary by the tremendous decrease in demand for fodder crops. All of these influences can be strikingly traced in almost any one of the States of the eastern seaboard, of which the State of New York is a conspicuous and interesting example.

Despite its great concentrated urban population, the Empire State, from a standpoint of acres employed, is predominantly a farm State and it continues to rank high among the States of the Union in farm production. It is an interesting fact that this farm production continues to be maintained at a high level in spite of the abandonment of literally millions of acres of land that has been used for growing crops for many generations, going back to colonial days.

A survey, some 4 years ago, developed the fact that approximately 4,000,000 acres of the soil of New York State, formerly used for farm purposes, had been abandoned and at that time abandonment of farms was going on at the rate of approximately 250,000 acres a year. Observation by agricultural economists led to the conclusion that it was economically a sound policy not merely to permit but to encourage this abandonment of marginal and submarginal land. The conclusion was reached that much of the land still in cultivation was being farmed uneconomically and that a competition of its products with those of better land tended not only from the standpoint of volume but from the standpoint of quality, to insure the reputation and the price of the products of the better land.

The situation is one which has its counterpart in many other States of the Union. The interesting thing about the situation in the State of New York is that action was taken by the State to correct this condition. Much of the submarginal areas in the State consists of hilly land better suited to growing trees than to any other purpose. In part for the purpose of benefiting agriculture and in part to realize other values, the State has undertaken, and has in process of accomplishment a program of reforestation on a broad scale. A part of that program is to give encouragement to individuals and communities to reforest submarginal lands. This encouragement is given by State appropriations to supplement county funds, by the furnishing of young trees free to public authorities and by furnishing them at cost to private individuals. Special provisions for the taxation of reforested land are another means of encouragement.

A still broader effort has been undertaken by the State on its own initiative and responsibility. A program has been laid out for the purpose by the State of 1,000,000 acres of abandoned farm lands, over a period of a dozen years, for reforestation. Although the program has been under way only 3 years, already approximately 200,000 acres have been acquired and approximately 60,000 acres have been planted. The plan has had the formal approval of the people of the State at referendum election, which furnishes a strong guaranty that it will be completed.

An essential part of the general scheme is the planning of agricultural production. Along with the reforestation program in New York State has gone an economic land survey, which not only indicates the submarginal areas suitable for reforestation, but points out the direction in which agricultural production should be developed. Values inherent in this survey include the saving of unnecessary expense for development of unprofitable areas, the location of roads, schools, and even villages where they will most usefully serve the needs of the population and a saving of expense for such developments where they will not be permanently useful. With a more logical concentration of farm production, communities can be better served with schools, roads, power lines, telephones, and all the other facilities that contribute to a most satisfactory form of living.

Reforestation in New York has also made its contribution to relieving unemployment. Last year we drew the extra workers needed in the tree nurseries and for the planting crews from community lists of unemployed, and 10,000 persons were thus given an opportunity to earn wages for useful work. It was this experience that suggested a wider use of the unemployed on reforestation projects in the Nation.

The pattern of what New York State has planned and is attempting in planting forests in submarginal land can well be applied to other States. It will contribute to efficient production, will lessen the depressing influence upon prices caused by competition of the products of poor land, and it will effect a substantial saving in the expenditure of public funds, which also has an important bearing on the farmers' economic life.

In the State of New York we have also made some attempt to adjust the scheme of taxation to modern conditions in the interest of the farmer. There was a time when the expense of construction and maintenance of public roads was considered logically to be chargeable exclusively to the locality in which the roads were built. That fitted reasonably well the conditions of the days of the farm wagon, the horse and buggy, and the steam railroad as the sole means of long-distance transportation. It does not fit today's conditions at all. A check of the vehicles on even one of the most remote of country roads will reveal in most cases that local inhabitants are not the major users of them. Even if a so-called "farm-to-market road" were used exclusively for hauling farm produce to market, which is not the case, it does not necessarily follow that the expense of maintaining the road should be chargeable only to the land from which the products originate. The cost of the road may properly be considered as a part of the cost of the product delivered to the market; and only if the farmer himself were, in all cases, the transporting agent, could all the road cost be properly chargeable to him.

In dealing with this problem the State of New York, along with other States, has experimented with various types of State aid. One form was the distribution of State aid on a valuation basis. A later development was the matching of appropriations by localities. Naturally this gave a tremendous advantage to the richer suburban communities with high land values. This was the situation when Governor Roosevelt took office in 1930. He appointed an agricultural advisory commission, of which I happened to have the honor of being chairman, and which considered this and many other problems affecting rural communities. One of the commission's first recommendations was for the levying of a gasoline tax, primarily for road purposes. They followed this with the recommendation that aid for farm-to-market roads be distributed on a mileage basis. Legislation to accomplish this was passed and it has resulted in a very great improvement of roads in localities where improvement was most needed without imposing an unbearable strain on strictly farm property which it was designed to help.

The State, on the recommendations of the same advisory body, undertook experiments with various types of road construction suitable for rural highways. The road program in the State is still under development but the policy underlying it is that the whole State is intimately concerned with rural planning and the provision of highway access to localities which are permanent farming regions.

The school problem has similar aspects. The theory that the State could guarantee full educational rights to the children of all its citizens has never been fully realized and it is perhaps an impossible ideal, but there has been room for improvement toward that ideal. The State, at the suggestion of the agricultural advisory commission, undertook measures to enlarge the educational opportunities of children in rural regions by establishing minimum standards and increasing the rate of contribution to the more sparsely settled rural communities.

These are types of legislation and State action made possible by departing somewhat from ancient precedents in State government. I think we need not regard ourselves as bound by a system which leaves the conduct of State affairs entirely to representatives chosen on a geographical basis. In any State farmers and their organizations should, I believe, find means for studying among themselves the specific problems of State government which intimately affect them and of laying their conclusions before governing authorities. There are many ways of doing this but I think the course followed in New York has many features to recommend it.

The prime essential to making the views of the farmer really effective in any branch of government is that they should give serious and fair-minded study to their own needs and their relation to other groups in the State population. In New York State the farmers have relied heavily on the advice of experts, including members of the staffs of their State colleges, who are equipped to make a careful and scientific study of economic, social, and political questions, questions that are political in the broad sense. It seems to me that in some cases farmers have exercised their undoubted right to influence legislation and governmental action without the right sort of inquiry and study made of their own initiative, but rather in response to the suggestions of the advocate of some particular theory or project. Of course this relates to the whole question of how to make citizenship active and effective. I touch upon it because I think it has a really important bearing on the farm problem and progress toward more suitable conditions for agriculture.
